We are told that "unless we have degenerated in enterprise, self-reliance, and pluck we shall undertake and accomplish this work without calling upon anybody for aid outside ourselves," and that it is humiliating to the pride of our great State to come here as a beggar for "the mere pittance of a few millions." Is it the amount which transforms a beggar's appeal into a just demand? Do not we who favor this bill stand precisely where our fathers who projected and built our canals stood? They came to Congress for aid at a time when the circumstances made the work almost entirely local in its character, when but a very small portion of the traffic could be expected from beyond the limits of our State. We come here with the same demand, but with circumstances so changed that no one can successfully dispute the justice of the demand, even though they may doubt its wisdom or propriety. We can stand the term of beggars as well as those to whose "enterprise, pluck, and reliance" we are indebted for the work.

If these gentlemen from New York who may see fit to oppose this measure understood that the main reason for hostility at home, on the part of sections off the line of the canals, is based upon that provision of the bill which guarantees the freedom of the commerce of the nation, they might realize that they are sitting on a limb and sawing vigorously between themselves and the trunk of the tree. I do not understand why a demand made for the improvement of a harbor, or the erection of a Government building, works which in character certainly are more local than national in benefit, should be considered proper, while a demand for a work decidedly more national than local in character should be stigmatized as the appeal of beggars.

But we are told by these gentlemen that there must be no log-rolling. By this I presume is meant that we must not vote or agree to vote for other measures in consideration of receiving support from the friends of such other propositions. I can only say that no such tender has been made or received with reference to any bill now pending in this House. All that is asked is that this bill be treated upon its merits, that it be accorded a degree of attention worthy of its importance and befitting its national character, a fair consideration, and that your votes be cast upon the simple merits of the case, just as I, speaking only for myself, shall vote upon other measures as they are brought up for disposal. And I shall not be deterred from voting for any other measure if it commends itself to my judgment because it may involve the risk of being charged with the offense of log-rolling.

Again it is said if the work is done by the State of New York it will cost but a fraction of the amount which would be expended under the General Government. This statement was seriously made in the State capitol at Albany, an edifice which will go down in history as a monument of extravagance second to none other in the record of our State or nation. But as the bill provides that the work shall be done under the direction of the State authorities, this objection falls, and I shall hope and pray that if the bill becomes a law, there will be no change of "architects" during the progress of construction.

And when it is said that the members from the State of New York should not accept national aid for the canals because it would prevent them from voting against other measures, I wonder in what degree they have been able to prevent unwise legislation heretofore enacted when no measure of this character was pending. New York is a great and influential State, but the country outside is grander and more powerful. New York city is likewise great and important, but the rest of the State can and does outvote her. I am proud of both, but I fear that we are apt to overestimate our influence and strength in the councils of the nation. Passing resolutions at home does not startle or electrify the members outside of our State.

We from New York prick up our ears when such resolves are showered down upon us, in anticipation of the suspension of the rules and prompt consideration. But it is simply the painful truth to state that many of these papers are carefully filed—in the waste-basket. Silver coinage continues still, and other questions, big with importance in the minds of our citizens at home, are still hung up in the committees, whose members do not seem to be inspired with that awe and reverence which the loyal New Yorker feels. And with all proper respect for the citizens of the metropolis, I fear that they, too, overestimate their strength in the Legislature of our State. I am afraid that they will realize when too late that upon this question of canal maintenance there is a sentiment of hostility which bodes no good to the commercial supremacy of the chief city of the Union so far as that depends upon the canal system of our State as freight-carriers and regulators.

VOTE ON ABOLISHING TOLLS.

I am aware that great faith is placed upon the vote of 1882, abolishing tolls on the canals, and we are pointed to those figures as conclusive evidence of the devotion of our people to our canal interests. These figures are not only interesting but instructive. Only about one-half of our citizens voted upon that constitutional amendment. Only about two-thirds of the voters who cast their ballots that day for governor had interest enough or understood the question sufficiently to vote upon that canal amendment. Of the 312,000 majority for the measure nearly 300,000 came from the four counties, Albany, New York, Kings, and Erie. In the counties of New York, Kings, and Erie, all important railroad centers, over 282,000 votes were cast in favor, and less than 2,000 against. This unanimity is singular, if not suspicious. The railroads must indeed have been very friendly (or very weak in their opposition) to assist in or permit the bringing about a result which would force them to still lower freight rates.

There are those who believe that it was a masterpiece of railroad strategy to make the canals a burden upon our tax-payers in order that a realization of its weight would induce uneasiness, discontent, and finally bring about an overwhelming clamor for relief in the shape of abandonment. I do not know, of course, if this was the moving cause of their hearty support, but the figures will convince every one who examines them and is fair enough to admit that the influence of railroads reaches far beyond the paltry nineteen hundred votes cast in opposition, that the railroad interests in those four counties were heartily in favor of the abolition of tolls; and they will soon reap their reward—the abandonment of our canals—unless the General Government prevents.

The circumstances surrounding us render us helpless. We are not paupers. We seek not charity, but demand justice, and that relief which we can not obtain at home, protection for interests which in scope outreach any of the public works of this nation. Five millions are demanded, the interest upon which amounts to $125,000 per annum, for which we give the freedom of canals which at the lowest rate of tolls ever levied yielded a revenue of over $665,000, for the single and last year of such collections. Why, sir, the Mississippi River alone has been accorded since the war appropriations amounting to nearly $22,000,000, and the end is not yet.

And here let me furnish some figures concerning expenditures which are both interesting and instructive.

Of the total appropriations made at the last session of the Forty-eighth Congress for public works, amounting to $6,048,524.71, New York received $645,750, or about one-tenth. New York pays one-seventh of the national taxes.

The river and harbor appropriation bill of that Congress reached nearly $15,000,000. New York, which contains within her territorial limits the chief city and harbor of the Union, the financial and commercial center of the republic, from which was exported last year nearly one-half the entire exports of the country, received less than one-fifteenth of the total. Sixteen of the Southern States, with a population of 18,507,324, a little over one-third, received more than one-half of the total appropriation. The statement of postal receipts and expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, shows a deficiency of $7,485,391.38. The sixteen States alluded to as having a little over one-third of the entire population of the country contributed to this deficiency $4,188,406.99, nearly half a million of dollars more than one-half. New York shows a profit in this account of nearly $2,000,000, about $200,000 more than all the other States combined that show an excess of receipts over expenditures.

I desire, also, to submit a table showing the collections of internal revenue by States for the year ending June 30, 1885, the expense, and the percentage of cost to the collections.

LEGISLATING FOR THE NATION.

I do not call up these figures for the purpose of making invidious comparisons, but as it may be claimed that the Southern States have little or no direct interest in this water system, it is hoped that these statistics will prompt them to acknowledge that at least upon a basis of fair distribution of benefits we are entitled to the consideration demanded.

I do not begrudge the expenditure alluded to because the people of some States receive a greater local benefit from them than do we. I realize, for instance, that when we ask the Southern members to vote appropriations for pensions to our soldiers, made necessary to discharge the obligations incurred in the preservation of the Union, the prosperity of any part of which is reflected in a great or lesser degree upon the remotest corner of our country, it must bring to their minds a fresh realization of their own great and sorrowful sacrifices.

I am not so narrow in mental construction as to prompt opposition to expenditures in which my section does not directly share in benefit. I am more in harmony with the expressions made by the Massachusetts Legislature in reply to an application which those beggars, our fathers, made to assist in the construction of the great Erie Canal, which, outside of China, is the most important in the world, and the free use of which we now tender for the improvement not only necessary to prevent its disuse, but essential to its very existence and preservation.

Said our commissioners in their report of the action of States in 1811 upon the question of national aid:

> Massachusetts, with the impartial and dignified wisdom of conscious greatness, resolved unanimously that the Senators of that commonwealth be instructed and their representatives be requested to use their influence for promoting by all reasonable encouragement, in such mode as Congress in their wisdom might direct, the opening of a communication by means of a canal navigation between the great lakes and Hudson River.

I am more in accord with the sentiments expressed by Daniel Webster in his celebrated speech on Foote's resolution, in reply to Mr. Hayne, when he said:

> We who come here as agents and representatives of these narrow-minded and selfish men of New England consider ourselves as bound to regard with an equal eye the good of the whole in whatever is within our powers of legislation. Sir, if a railroad or canal beginning in South Carolina and ending in South Carolina appeared to me to be of national importance and national magnitude, believing as I do that the power of the Government extends to the encouragement of works of that description, if I were to stand up here and ask what interest has Massachusetts in a railroad in South Carolina, I should not be willing to face my constituents. These same narrow-minded men would tell me that they had sent me to act for the whole country, and that one who possessed too little comprehension, either of intellect or feeling, one who was not large enough both in mind and in heart to embrace the whole, was not fit to be intrusted with the interest of any part.

COST OF NEW YORK CANALS.

Statements are made, and for lack of investigation pass current for truth, that the canals of New York have paid over and above all costs and charges anywhere from thirty to sixty millions of dollars into the treasury of the State, and that, therefore, it is not becoming to apply to the nation for assistance so long as the canals have so magnificent a sum on the credit side of their account with our tax-payers. These statements can be demonstrated by figures only when part of them are omitted from the calculation or when the Erie is singled out from the system without reference to the accounts of the tributary canals, which assisted the traffic of the trunk canal, or those necessarily kept up as feeders. You can not fairly separate these accounts, for these canals are substantially one system, of which the Erie is the main stem or trunk.

The account on September 30, 1883, shows that after deducting the canal debt outstanding and unprovided for there remains a net profit of $2,078,169.85. But in this calculation there is no charge for the interest on the canal debt, which has been and is raised annually by taxation, and which on September 30, 1883, had reached the sum of $39,844,966.21. Deduct from this sum the net profit as just stated and there remains as the cost of the canal system of the State of New York $37,766,796.36. That was the sum on September 30, 1883, which has since been increased over $4,000,000 for interest on the debt and the expense of care and maintenance. So that to-day that system owes to our tax-payers over $42,000,000, which will be swelled by the annual interest charge and maintenance, until the debt is extinguished, to over $50,000,000. These are our figures, and thus stands the account, a simple presentation of which punctures that feature of the flimsy charge against the beggars.

This, Mr. Chairman, is our case; and I close with the statement that whatever may be the fate of this measure, I have endeavored to present a fair, candid view of the situation without intending to misrepresent or cause needless alarm, but with the sincere belief and impression, based upon a study of the sentiment at home, intended to be thorough and extensive, that the fate of this great national outlet to the Eastern seaboard rests in the hands of Congress.

The hour for the consideration of bills having expired, Mr. WEBER retaining the floor, the Speaker resumed the chair; and Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1577) for the permanent improvement of the Erie and Oswego Canals, and to secure the freedom of the same to the commerce of the United States, had come to no resolution thereon.

TITLES TO CERTAIN LANDS IN TEXAS.

Mr. JONES, of Texas, introduced a bill (H. R. 10409) to amend certain titles to lands acquired by judicial proceedings in the courts of the United States in Texas, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LAKE FRONT, CHICAGO.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 232) relating to the title of the United States in the lake front at Chicago, Ill.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 6983) for the relief of certain soldiers of the Twelfth Michigan Volunteer Infantry dishonorably discharged under Special Order 92, War Department, Adjutant-General's office, dated March 1, 1866.

An act (H. R. 1905) for the relief of Theodore W. Tallmadge.

An act (H. R. 68) for the relief of William P. Chambliss.

Joint resolution (H. Res. 118) relative to certain papers in the State Department by error.

An act (H. R. 10239) making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for public printing and binding for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

An act (H. R. 1418) for the relief of Henry Martin.

An act (H. R. 3504) to amend section 4414 of the Revised Statutes relating to inspectors of hulls and boilers.

An act (H. R. 1813) for the relief of Pattison & Caldwell.

An act (H. R. 1659) for the relief of the survivors of the exploring steamer Jeannette and the widows and children of those who perished in the retreat from the wreck of that vessel in the arctic seas.

An act (H. R. 5878) to amend the act entitled "an act to modify the postal money-order system, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1883.

An act (H. R. 7536) to extend the free-delivery system of the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes.

A joint resolution (H. Res. 67) for the relief of William B. Isaacs & Co.

An act (H. R. 5890) for the relief of Grafton Monroe.

An act (H. R. 9987) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Saint Louis River at the most accessible point between the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin.

An act (H. R. 2013) for the relief of Myron E. Dunlap.

An act (H. R. 6489) granting a pension to Mrs. Barbara Fuchs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the title of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, at the close of the last session was there not under consideration in Committee of the Whole a bill relating to fortifications, and is not that the first bill in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that such a bill was before the House, but that it is now in the hands of a committee of conference. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10394) making appropriations for the support and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes.

Mr. WELLBORN. I ask unanimous consent that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Chairman, in preparing this bill the Committee on Indian Affairs have adhered strictly to the rule which forbids legislation on general appropriation bills, and therefore no changes are proposed in existing law. The bill simply appropriates for the expenses of the Government under the law as it now is. I shall not therefore enter into any general discussion of Indian policies; but perhaps it may be appropriate for me to give in a few minutes the general outlines of the bill as compared with the features of the Indian appropriation bill passed at the last session of Congress, and that is all that I shall undertake to do. The various appropriations contained in the bill, according to the usage which has prevailed for many years, are grouped under seven heads:

1. Current and contingent expenses.
2. Fulfilling treaty stipulations.
3. Support of various tribes of Indians.
4. Miscellaneous.
5. General and incidental expenses of the Indian service.
6. Support of Indian schools.
7. Interest on trust funds.

With reference to the first class of appropriations, the aggregate of this bill is the aggregate of the bill of the last session of Congress.

With reference to the second class of appropriations, those for fulfilling treaty stipulations, the amount of the bill of last session was $2,384,107.84, while the amount of the corresponding items in the bill now presented is $2,179,537.64, being $204,570.20 less than the bill of last session.

The aggregate of the third class of items, those for support of Indians, was, in the bill of last session, $1,047,500. This year the aggregate of the corresponding appropriations is $990,000, the bill of the present session being $57,500 less than the bill of last session.

The appropriation in the bill of last session for general and incidental expenses was $131,000. Those items this year aggregate $129,000.

In reference to the next class of items—miscellaneous—the aggregate last year was $483,000, while the aggregate of appropriations of that class as recommended in this bill is $466,000.

As to the next class of items—the appropriations for support of schools—the aggregate of the appropriations in the last bill was $1,211,415; in this bill, it is $1,155,915, being a reduction of $55,500.

The aggregate of the appropriations contained in the last bill was $5,561,262.84. The aggregate of the present bill is $5,224,662.64, making the aggregate reduction in this bill as compared with the bill of last year $336,570.20, the reduction upon the estimates being $384,191.

These statements, Mr. Chairman, give the general outlines of this bill; and in presenting the bill now for the consideration of the Committee of the Whole, I have nothing further to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill by paragraphs for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of physician and two teachers, $2,500; in all, $49,000.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move to amend by inserting after the word "thousand," in line 166, the words "two hundred;" so as to make the appropriation $49,200. I will state my object in offering this amendment. The physician at the agency under consideration has frequently to travel 100 miles in going from and returning to the agency to see the different bands of Indians who are under his charge; and the agent of those Indians has informed me that the physician does not get enough compensation, his present pay being only $1,000. In view of the long distances he has to travel, and other considerations of that kind, I am satisfied that he ought to receive at least $200 more.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Chairman, I have no authority to accept that amendment on behalf of the Committee on Indian Affairs; but, as my colleague from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] states that this increase of $200 is necessary, I am willing to submit the question to the Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

IOWAS.

For interest, in lieu of investment, on $57,500, balance of $157,500, to July 1, 1886, at 5 per cent. per annum, for education or other beneficial purposes, under the direction of the President, per ninth article of treaty of May 17, 1854, $2,875.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move to amend by striking out in line 322 the word "6" and inserting "7." This merely changes the date "1886" to "1887."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

KANSAS.

For interest, in lieu of investment, on $200,000, at 5 per cent. per annum, per second article of treaty of January 14, 1846, $1,524.

Mr. WELLBORN. By reason of an inadvertence this paragraph in relation to the Kansas Indians needs correction. I move to amend by striking out the whole paragraph and substituting what I send to the desk. The amendment makes no change in the amount of the appropriation, but is merely more specific.

Strike out lines 328 to 331, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

For interest in lieu of investment on $200,000, $10,000 being the pro rata amount due the Kansas tribe of Indians per second article of treaty of January 14, 1846, $1,524.02.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move also to amend by striking out, in line 367, the word "seven," and inserting "eight;" so as to make the date read "1888," instead of "1887."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For interest on $50,000, at the rate of 5 per centum per annum, to be paid annually, for the support of schools, as per third article of treaty of March 21, 1862, $2,500.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move to amend by striking out "1862," in line 553, and inserting "1866."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of second blacksmith, and furnishing iron, steel, and other material, per eighth article of same treaty, $1,600; in all, $1,218,500.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move to amend by striking out, in line 694, the word "two," and inserting the word "three;" so as to make the amount $1,318,500. This amendment merely makes the aggregate conform to the various items embraced in the paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For eighteenth of thirty installments, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for clothing, blankets, and such other articles as he may deem proper and necessary, under eleventh article of same treaty, $30,000.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move to amend by striking out, in the first line of the paragraph just read, the word "eighteenth," and inserting "nineteenth."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Incidental expenses of Indian service in Wyoming: For general incidental expenses of the Indian service, including traveling expenses of agents, $1,000.

Mr. TOOLE. I move to amend by adding, after the clause just read, the paragraph which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to negotiate with the Crow Indians in the Territory of Montana for a reduction of their reservation, and for that purpose any unexpended balance, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the amount heretofore appropriated, incident to the reduction and change of reservations in the State of Minnesota and the Territories of Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and Washington, is hereby appropriated and made available.

Mr. WELLBORN. I will reserve a point of order on that amendment, but I do not know that I shall urge it. I will first hear the explanation of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. TOOLE].

Mr. TOOLE. Mr. Speaker, this amendment will involve, as I believe, no additional appropriation. At the last session of Congress the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to negotiate for the reduction of certain reservations in the State of Minnesota and the Territories of Montana, Dakota, Idaho, and Washington; and an appropriation of $15,000 was made for that purpose. That appropriation has not been exhausted; and it is desirable that if there remains any unexpended balance of the appropriation, it be made available for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the Crow Indians in the Territory of Montana, who are desirous, as I know, of having their reservation curtailed.

Mr. NELSON. I think the amendment proposed is wholly unnecessary. Under the language of the amendment made last year full authority is given to treat with these Indians, and an appropriation of $15,000 was made for the purpose of making negotiations of treaties with Indians in Minnesota, Dakota, and Northern Montana, which will include these Indians. I am informed there is still left an unexpended balance of that appropriation.

Mr. WELLBORN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WELLBORN. My information is that that is a continuing appropriation. How is that?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; that is a continuing appropriation; and nearly $10,000 of it, as I understand, yet remains unexpended, and there is a commission now out there in Montana engaged in negotiating with the different tribes.

Mr. WELLBORN. There is no objection if the amendment——

Mr. TOOLE. If the gentleman will allow me I will say that while the appropriation is a continuing one, nevertheless, so far as the reservations in Montana are concerned, it applies only to the Blackfeet reservation which is in Northern Montana. I also ask to have it apply to the Crow reservation in east Montana, making it dependent upon the fact there is an unexpended balance, which will relieve the objection, of course, of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. NELSON. Let me quote the language as it stands upon the Statute Book:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate with the several tribes and bands of Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota for such modification of existing treaties with said Indians and such change of their reservation as may be deemed desirable by said Indians and the Secretary of the Interior, and as to what sum shall be a just and equitable liquidation of all claims which any of said tribes now have upon the Government; and also to enable said Secretary to negotiate with the various bands or tribes of Indians in Northern Montana and at Fort Berthold, in Dakota, for a reduction of their respective reservations, or for removal therefrom to other reservations.

I think the Crows are a portion of the Indians included by this language which I have just read. The Crow reservation is north of the Northern Pacific. There is no doubt about it, and that this language was intended to cover them all.

Mr. TOOLE. If that is understood to be the effect of the language, then there is no necessity, perhaps, for the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. It is a continuing appropriation, and ought to be left undisturbed. Under it, all that the gentleman from Montana desires can be accomplished.

Mr. TOOLE. With that understanding, then, that it does include all that my amendment seeks to accomplish, I will withdraw it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. At the end of line 948, I move to insert the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

No money appropriated for the payment of agency farmers shall be expended for the payment of any agency farmer hereafter appointed who shall not, at the time of said appointment, have been for five years in all previous thereto practically engaged in the occupation of farming.

Mr. WELLBORN. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman reserve his point of order, or insist upon it at this time?

Mr. WELLBORN. I will hear the gentleman make his statement, of course, before insisting on the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The amendment I propose does not affect any agency farmer now in office. It does provide that no part of the money appropriated by this bill shall be available for the payment of any agency farmer hereafter appointed who was not engaged for a period of five years in all, previous to his appointment, in occupation as a practical farmer. It only applies to appointments hereafter to be made. I wish I could have reason to believe the House would go far enough to make it apply to agency farmers now employed, but fearing a proposition so radical as that might meet with effective opposition I have drawn it to apply only to future appointments.

Why should not this limitation on this appropriation be made? It does not change existing law. It is a limitation on the appropriation which in the Committee of the Whole has been repeatedly decided to be in order on an appropriation bill. I see by the next item two sets of farmers are provided for in the bill—"practical farmers" and "agency farmers." They ought all to be practical farmers. If there is any man in the world who should be a practical farmer it is that man who is paid by the Government to teach agriculture to these Indians, now ignorant of the art of agriculture. The teachers should themselves be familiar with that art which they profess to teach. Shall the blind lead the blind? Shall the maimed and halt be taken to support the lame and crippled? Let these men hereafter be in fact what they are now in name—farmers.

As to the point of order, I have only to repeat that this is simply a limitation of the appropriation, and does not in any way change the existing law.

Mr. WELLBORN. I raised the point of order on the amendment, not having heard it when it was read; but if it is simply a limitation on this appropriation I concede the proposition is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Clerk again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. WELLBORN. As that amendment is drawn it is not confined to the appropriations in this bill, but is general in its character.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will insert the word "hereby."

Mr. WELLBORN. I concede with that amendment the point of order would not apply. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, however, that I hope the amendment will not prevail. I think that is a matter which can be better left to Executive discretion, and that to adopt the arbitrary limitation proposed by the amendment would not be wise. I hope for that reason the amendment will not prevail. The point of order, I concede, is not well taken.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In the one minute of time remaining I desire to say that under administrations previous to this one, as well as this one—I do not limit it to the present Administration—there has been too much left to Executive discretion; and for that very reason I have moved the amendment now before the committee for action.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being withdrawn, the question recurs on the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 36.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. I send to the desk an amendment, to follow line 949.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to use the money which has been, or may hereafter be, covered into the Treasury under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and which is carried on the books of the Department under the caption of "Indian moneys, proceeds of labor," for the benefit of the several tribes on whose account said money was covered in, in such way and for such purposes as in his discretion he may think best.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to explain briefly the provisions of this amendment. Until 1876 there never had been any account taken of the fund accruing at the various agencies from the sale of hay, grass, coal, down timber, and material of that kind. Under orders of the Interior Department, in 1876 the agents commenced taking account of the funds accruing from these sources, but did not cover the moneys into the Treasury, but kept them to be expended for the benefit of the Indians under the direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. In 1883 the Committee on Appropriations inserted an item in the deficiency appropriation bill requiring that the money should be covered into the Treasury by the agents; and further, that it should be expended for the benefit of the Indians under the orders of the Secretary of the Interior.

The Secretary of the Interior construed that act to give to him authority to draw orders upon the fund as in his judgment it should be drawn out. The Treasury Department, however, has taken a different view of the matter, and thus this money can not now be drawn from the Treasury upon the orders or warrants of the Secretary of the Interior.

To avoid this conflict, and to provide a construction of the act of 1883, this amendment is offered. This is prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior. It is also recommended by the President. The object, as I have already suggested, is simply to amend the act of 1883, so that this fund can be paid out for the benefit of the Indians to whom it belongs upon the orders of the Secretary of the Interior. I concede that the point of order may be made in opposition to the amendment, but the subject was considered by our committee, and it was thought that no point of order should be urged against it, and I hope it will not be.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Chairman, perhaps the point of order would lie against the amendment, but its purpose is simply to settle differences which exist in construing a statute between the Interior and Treasury Departments. I shall not, therefore, raise the point of order against it; and I hope the amendment will prevail.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of Indian police: For the service of not exceeding 700 privates, at $8 per month each, and not exceeding 70 officers, at $10 per month each, of Indian police, to be employed in maintaining order and prohibiting illegal traffic in liquor on the several Indian reservations, and within the Territory of Alaska, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, and for the purchase of equipments and rations for policemen of non-ration agencies, $90,000.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I submit the amendment I send to the desk.

After line 964 insert:

"That immediately upon and after the passage of this act any Indian committing against the person of any Indian policeman or any Indian United States deputy marshal, while engaged in the execution of any United States process, or engaged in any other duty imposed upon such policeman or marshal by the laws of the United States any of the following crimes, namely, murder, manslaughter, or assault with intent to kill, within the Indian Territory, shall be subject to the laws of the United States relating to such crimes, and shall be tried by the district court of the United States exercising criminal jurisdiction where said offense was committed, and shall be subject to the same penalties as are all other persons charged with the commission of such crimes, respectively; and the said courts are hereby given jurisdiction in all such cases."

Mr. WELLBORN. I reserve the point of order upon that amendment, desiring to hear the gentleman make a statement showing the necessity for its presentation.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to invite the attention of all the members of the House who feel any interest in Indian affairs to the purpose for which this amendment is offered, and to that end I send to the desk a letter which I received in this morning's mail from an officer of the Government located at the Five Agencies, an extract from which I will ask the Clerk to read, although it is a personal letter and not intended for public use.

The Clerk read as follows:

You have doubtless heard of the cruel murder of Captain Sam Sixkiller. He was shot down in the streets of Muscogee, on Christmas eve, by Dick Vann and Alf. Cunningham. He was unwell and unarmed. His body was riddled with balls.

Although Sixkiller was a deputy United States marshal and a United States Indian policeman at the time of his death, I understand that Judge Parker rules that he has no jurisdiction in the case—that Sixkiller was an Indian, and the matter is triable before their court.

If such is the law, the United States statutes should be so amended as to protect United States Indian police when acting as United States Marshals, just as other marshals are protected in the discharge of their duties Unless some such legislation be had, the police force in the Territory will become dispirited and inactive, and outlaws will, to the same extent, be emboldened to deeds of violence. I present this point to you for elaboration, and feel that you will give it that attention which it deserves. The United States must not release their grasp on this Territory. To remand it to Indian rule is to consign this fair land to anarchy, red ruin, and utter woe, or, as Tennyson puts it in his last poem, "Cosmos, Chaos! Chaos, Cosmos!"

Mr. ROGERS. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs in his report for 1885 alludes to this Indian police, and it is one of the curious anomalies of the condition of things now obtaining in that Indian country. I desire to invite attention very briefly to a passage contained in the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, showing the importance of the duties devolving upon the Indian police of recent years, provided and paid for by the Government of the United States.

INDIAN POLICE.

The rapidity with which the entire area of the western part of the country is being opened up and settled brings settlers to the very doors of the Indian reservations, oftentimes introducing a class of men none too scrupulous regarding the rights of others; men who regard the property of the Indian as lawful prey, and the life of the Indian as no obstacle to the possession of it; men who are without many of the necessaries of life, needing fuel, needing horses or ponies, needing beef, needing grazing ground, and a thousand other things, many of which are possessed by the Indians through issues made by the United States. This has made some kind of a constabulary force on Indian reservations an actual necessity, and the necessity has been increasing ever year in a ratio far exceeding the relief granted. Agencies, which, a year ago, few white men had ever crossed, may be almost surrounded this year with settlers and invaders. Mines, real or prospective, have tempted thousands of men into localities heretofore occupied only by Indians. Without regard to the rights of the Indians, they are constantly trespassing, harassing the Indians, provoking quarrels, thieving, and making the life of the agent one of constant anxiety and vigilance. Agency employés are very few, and cannot be spared for police duty.

Under these circumstances relief has come through and by the Indians themselves; for, fully realizing the situation, Congress has for the past few years provided for the appointment and equipment of Indian police. To a great extent they have met the necessities of the situation and have proved valuable aids to the Indian agents in preventing trespassing and robbery by lawless whites, and in suppressing disorder, violence, and incipient revolt among the more restless of their own people. Many instances of surprising fidelity to the trust imposed upon them, under circumstances which would swerve many a white man from his duty, might be related of these Indian policemen.

Commencing with the present fiscal year, the salary was increased for the officers from $8 to $10 per month, and for the privates from $5 to $8 per month. This has enabled the agents to select a better class of men for the service, and will tend to make the force more stable, most of the resignations heretofore having been caused by meager salaries. I also confidently expect that the better class of men will render the force still more efficient, so that notwithstanding the increasing necessity for this class of employés their greater efficiency will enable me to lessen their number, and I have therefore estimated for only 700 privates and 70 officers for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

In the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for the present year there will be found a passage also upon the same subject. Among other things he says:

INDIAN POLICE.

The greatest number of Indian police in the service at any one time during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, was 701. Considering the very meager compensation allowed, namely, $10 per month for commissioned officers and $8 per month for non-commissioned officers and privates, the service has been very satisfactory. The members of the police force are selected on account of their good character and influence among their people; a majority of them have families to support. They have proven themselves to be worthy of confidence, and have rendered valuable assistance to the agents in maintaining order and suppressing crime on the reservations. They are almost without exception courageous, determined men, who will without flinching face any danger in carrying out their instructions.

To bring the police service up to the highest degree of efficiency it is necessary that the entire time and attention of the men be devoted to their work; but it is often difficult to obtain the services of proper men on account of the small compensation. It would tend greatly to increase the efficiency of this branch of the service if a more liberal compensation could be allowed, even though the number of men should be reduced. The police in the discharge of their duties often come in contact with outlaws and men of desperate character, and being thus called upon to face danger and death, it is but fair that they should receive a compensation in some degree commensurate with the service rendered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. ROGERS.

Mr. ROGERS. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky for his courtesy. The report of the Commissioner proceeds:

The cost of their support is money well spent, as at most agencies they are the only means which the agent possesses for protecting his Indians against liquor traffic, cattle thieves, the inroads of bad white men, and for the suppression of every kind of vice and lawlessness on the reservation. Without them he would have much less power either to punish the bad or protect the good; and the knowledge that he has this reliable force always at hand has a much greater influence for good than appears on the surface.

Now, sir, we have the curious anomaly presented by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in these two consecutive reports, that these officers when they are selected by the Government of the United States either as deputy marshals or to be placed on the police force, may be shot down by men of their own tribes or any other Indian who belongs to these reservations, in cold blood while in the execution of a Government process; and yet the Government of the United States takes no notice, no cognizance of the offense.

Why, Mr. Chairman, this thing is appalling when you recollect the fact that all that one of these persons who live on the Indian reservations after failing, as is too often the case, to execute their own laws in a proper way—all a man who has committed an offense has to do is to cross the line of the Territory and he is as safe as the lawless persons and desperadoes from the States who take refuge in their country. Within the last three years, a man was charged with a public offense against the laws of the Indian Territory and took refuge in our own State, and when the governor of the Cherokee Nation applied for his extradition the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas properly declared that the Indian Territory was not a Territory or State within the meaning of the Constitution, and that the extradition laws did not apply to the Indian Territory.

Under this state of things, I submit the Government of the United States, which has seen fit to employ these men in the discharge of very important public duties, ought to protect them by throwing the panoply of its own laws and courts over them, and punishing those who shoot down these men in cold blood in the execution of its processes.

I state, not from personal knowledge, but from the general reputation of that distinguished officer who was shot down on Christmas eve in the town of Muscogee, this Indian policeman, Capt. Sam. Sixkiller, that he had no superior for courage, for manhood, for fidelity to public trust. When he was engaged in the service of his process he was shot down by this brace of conspirators and murderers, one of them a pardoned convict from the penitentiary. Yet no court in the land except the Indian courts can punish them for this offense against an officer of the United States.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I trust that the distinguished gentleman who is the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs will unite and coincide with me, instead of raising any point of order, in the effort to procure some law that shall protect the officers of the Government in the faithful and upright and honest discharge of their public duty.

Mr. WELLBORN. I am satisfied from the explanation of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] that the purpose which his amendment contemplates is meritorious, and while it is clearly open to a point of order, yet I am so thoroughly in accord with his amendment since he has stated its purpose that I for one will not press the point of order, and now withdraw it so far as I am concerned so as to let the matter go before the committee on its merits.

Mr. NELSON. While I am inclined to agree in the general object of the amendment I think it ought perhaps to be amended. It goes a little too far. It says:

That immediately upon and after the passage of this act, any Indian committing against the person of any Indian policeman or any Indian United States deputy marshal while engaged in the execution of any United States process, &c.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the committee to this fact, that under the laws of the Indian Territory they have their local police, and I submit that as to their local policemen we should have no legislation in this Indian appropriation bill; but that their Indian police, in respect to any official duty performed by them, should be amenable to and look for protection under their own laws. I think that we, in legislating here for this purpose, ought not to go further than to protect the deputy United States marshal in executing the process of the United States court or performing any duties the court imposes upon him.

Mr. WELLBORN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota permit me a question?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WELLBORN. Are the local police to whom the gentleman refers the police provided for in this bill?

Mr. NELSON. That is one of the clauses. I will read that clause of the amendment again:

That immediately upon and after the passage of this act any Indian committing against the person of any Indian policeman or any Indian United States deputy marshal while engaged in the execution of any process, &c.

Now I propose first, that we strike out the words "Indian policeman." I offer that amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. NELSON. I am not through yet, Mr. Chairman. Then I propose two other amendments. I move to insert the word "lawfully" after the word "while," so that the provision will read, "any Indian policeman or any Indian United States deputy marshal, while lawfully engaged in the execution of any United States process," &c.

Mr. ROGERS. I accept that.

Mr. NELSON. I propose also to amend by inserting the word "lawfully" before the words "engaged in any other duty," &c.

Mr. ROGERS. I accept that also.

Mr. NELSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have already said, I think it is unwise and injudicious for this House to interfere in respect to these Indian policemen. It is as though we should undertake to legislate here not merely to protect United States marshals or deputy marshals within the borders of a State, but should also undertake to protect the constables, the sheriffs, or other officers chosen under the authority of the State. I think that so far as this provision relates to the duties of Indian policemen appointed under the local Indian laws, it should be amended so as to leave that matter to their own courts and tribunals.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Chairman, I hope my colleague on the committee (Mr. NELSON) will not press the point of order he has presented, because, while these Indian policemen are located in the Indian country or the Indian Territory, they are really as much officers of the United States as the marshals are. In fact, their authority emanates from the United States Government; they are officers of the United States, and are entitled to the same protection from the United States Government that it gives to its other officers engaged in the performance of their duties.

Mr. NELSON. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to one fact? This provision applies to what is known as the Indian Territory, and we have no Indian police there such as we have, under the appropriation bill, at the other agencies and reservations.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, yes, in portions of it.

Mr. PEEL. I think the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is mistaken.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I am in accord with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], and, as my colleague on the committee [Mr. PEEL] has suggested, I trust that no point of order will be made against any part of this amendment. Knowing as I do the necessity for legalized and respected authority in the Indian Territory, I am in favor of any legislation that will give protection to the Government officers who are engaged there in discharging the duties imposed upon them, and of any legislation that will give to the courts of the United States authority to try offenders who obstruct them or strike them down. It is necessary, as suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], that these Indian policemen and these deputy marshals shall be protected by the Government of the United States in the performance of the duties imposed upon them by their superior officers. Indeed, if it were possible, I would go further than this bill goes. I would make it the duty of the chiefs of the several tribes to recognize the processes of the courts of the United States, and surrender such offenders for trial. Perhaps, however, that is going further than we can go at this time; but, unless the point of order is made against the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS], we can go to the extent proposed by that amendment, and I hope we shall do so, because of the necessities of the case so well set forth by him.

Mr. ROGERS. It was perhaps well, Mr. Chairman, that my friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] made the suggestion he did in regard to this, and I desire to obviate the point which he makes by qualifying the language of the amendment with reference to these Indian policemen. I did not intend that the provision should apply to the Indian policemen appointed by the Indian local government, but only to the police appointed under the authority of the public law of the United States. Therefore I propose, with the consent of the House, to change the amendment in that regard, so as to make it read, "Any Indians committing against the person of any Indian policeman appointed under the law of the United States," &c.

Mr. NELSON. That is right. I understand that the gentleman agrees also to the other two amendments which I have proposed.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes; I accept the insertion of the word "lawful" in both cases. It is necessary.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. ROGERS as modified and amended, and it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Indian-depredation claims: For continuing the investigation and examination of certain Indian-depredation claims originally authorized, and in the manner therein provided for, by the Indian appropriation act approved March 3, 1885, $20,000; and the examination and report shall include claims, if any, barred by statute, such fact to be stated in the report; and all claims whose examination shall be completed by January 1, 1887, shall then be reported to Congress, with the opinions and conclusions of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior upon all material facts, and all the evidence and papers pertaining thereto.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to line 994, simply to change a date.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend in line 994 by inserting the word "eight" instead of the word "seven."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of Indian industrial school at Carlisle, Pa., and for transportation of Indian pupils to and from said school, $80,000; and said sum shall be disbursed upon the basis of an allowance not exceeding $167, exclusive of transportation, for the support and education of each pupil actually maintained in and supported and educated at said school; but actual cost of transportation and other expenses of such pupils as are sent out of said school among farmers for support and education may be disbursed from said funds; for annual allowance to Capt. R. H. Pratt, in charge of said Indian industrial school, $1,000; in all, $81,000.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I see by the footings on the last page of this bill that it appropriates in the aggregate for the support of schools, $1,384,000. That embraces $650,000 for the support of day and industrial schools, and also the appropriations for the school at Chilocco, Ind. T., the schools in Alaska, the schools at Carlisle, Pa., Salem, Oreg., Genoa, Nebr., Hampton, Va., and Lawrence, Kans., as well as the Lincoln Institution at Philadelphia, Pa., and the Saint Ignatius Mission School on the Jocko reservation, Montana. I now move to strike out this appropriation of $81,000 for the school at Carlisle. If this amendment should prevail, I shall move to strike out the items for the school at Hampton and the Lincoln Institution, to which the Indian children have to be transported so long a distance. This would be a saving of $134,440, leaving an appropriation of $1,273,875 for education, at the day schools and other schools located in the States and Territories west of the Mississippi River.

This question has been so often under consideration in this House that I see no necessity of arguing it at the present time, as every member must understand it.

Mr. WELLBORN. If I understand the purpose of my colleague [Mr. THROCKMORTON] it is to strike out the appropriations for the Indian schools in Pennsylvania, the school at Hampton, and other Indian schools located in the East, away from the reservations.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Yes, sir, that is what I propose.

Mr. WELLBORN. I do not think the amendment of my colleague ought to prevail. I confess that were this a new proposition as to the propriety and expediency of establishing these schools at distances remote from the reservations, I should hesitate long before assenting to an appropriation for such a purpose. But the three schools particularly under consideration have been in existence some four or five years. At the Hampton school there are now some five hundred pupils. If this amendment should prevail, what is to become of these Indian children? I do not believe that these three Indian schools in the East ought to be extended, nor would I be willing to increase the appropriations for them; but under the circumstances confronting us to-day I do not deem it practicable to attempt to destroy these institutions. For that reason I am not in favor of the amendment.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I call the attention of my colleague to the title of this bill: "A bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes."

Now, the children in these schools are already provided for up to June 30 of the present year, 1887. If my amendment should prevail, there would be ample notice of the discontinuance of these schools, so that no more children would be brought to the East to be placed in them. But if my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, is not satisfied with that, I will offer another amendment providing that the appropriations for the Lincoln Institution and for the schools at Carlisle and Hampton shall cease after the year 1888. As a matter of course Congress could repeal such a provision and keep these institutions going; but I believe the time has come when these appropriations should cease. We provide in this bill for other Indian schools in the States and Territories, nearer to where the Indians reside; and these appropriations ought to answer all the purposes of Indian education.

Mr. PERKINS. If the last amendment indicated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] is now offered for adoption, I desire to make a point of order against it. I will inquire of the gentleman whether he simply gave notice of that amendment, or whether it is now pending.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. The amendment now pending is to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. PERKINS. I understood the gentleman to say he would offer another amendment.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I suggested that to the chairman of the Indian Committee, to ascertain whether he would accept it.

Mr. PERKINS. I concur with the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. WELLBORN] in the hope that this amendment will not prevail. It is very important to the educational interests of the Indians that these schools be continued. This matter was very fully discussed at the last session of Congress, and I will not spend time in repeating what was then said upon the subject.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. THROCKMORTON, it was not agreed to.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs whether he will not give us a yea-and-nay vote in the House on this proposition.

Mr. WELLBORN. It can not be done under the rules of the House, as the amendment has not been adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 120 Indian pupils at the school at Hampton, Va., $20,040.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move to strike out the paragraph just read.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of 450 Indian pupils, at $175 per annum each, at the Indian school at Lawrence, Kans., $61,250; pay of superintendent of school, $2,000; purchase of material and erection of shops, cottages, and out-buildings, and necessary repairs, $4,750; in all, $85,500.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move to amend by inserting, in line 1070, the words "seventy-eight" instead of "sixty-one."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move to amend by inserting "seven" instead of "two" in line 1070; so it will read:

For support and education of four hundred and fifty Indian pupils, at $175 per annum each, at the Indian school at Lawrence, Kansas, $78,750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of two hundred Indian pupils at Lincoln Institution, Philadelphia, Pa., at a rate not to exceed $167 per annum for each pupil, $33,400.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move to strike out that entire paragraph.

The amendment was disagreed to.

For trust-fund interest due Kaskaskia, Wea, Peoria, and Piankeshaw school-fund, $1,441.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move to amend by inserting the word "nine" instead of the word "one;" so it will read:

For trust-fund interest due Kaskaskia, Wea, Peoria, and Piankeshaw school-fund, $1,449.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the bill has been concluded.

Mr. WELLBORN. I ask, by unanimous consent, to go back for an amendment which will be offered by my colleague from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON], and which is rendered necessary by an amendment of the committee.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. On page 8, lines 165 and 166, the amendment adopted by the committee was to increase the sum to $49,200; and in order to make it correspond to the balance of the sentence "twenty-seven" should be inserted instead of "twenty-five;" so it will read:

Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches:
For twentieth of thirty installments, as provided to be expended under the tenth article of treaty of October 21, 1867, concluded at Medicine Lodge Creek, in Kansas, with the Kiowas and Comanches, and under the third article of treaty of the same date with the Apaches, $30,000;
For purchase of clothing, as provided in the same treaties, $12,000;
For pay of carpenter, farmer, blacksmith, miller, and engineer, $4,500;
For pay of physician and two teachers, $2,700; in all, $49,200.

Mr. WELLBORN. That is an amendment which has been agreed upon.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to recurring to the section referred to?

There was no objection; and Mr. THROCKMORTON'S amendment was received and agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask, by unanimous consent, to recur to line 365 on page 16 for the purpose of making an amendment, inserting after word "year" the letter "s," making it plural, and at the end of line 365 inserting "eighty-six," so it will read:

During the summer and fall of the years 1885 and 1886, to be available for expenditure until June 30, 1887.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to recurring to the section referred to, for the purpose indicated?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS' amendment was received and agreed to.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10394) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. WELLBORN. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The question, then, will be on the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WELLBORN. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof, the bill was passed.

Mr. WELLBORN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHEELER. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. ROGERS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee takes up for consideration a bill (H. R. 10395) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888.

Mr. WHEELER. I move, by unanimous consent, that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will now be read by sections for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For renewing furniture (desks and benches) in section-rooms, and repairing the same, $500.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to add, after line 208, the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent fund, to be expended under the direction of the academic board; for instruments, books, repairs to apparatus, and other incidental expenses, not otherwise provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For remodeling and rebuilding the academic building, putting an additional story thereon, and rendering it fire-proof and suitable for section-rooms for instruction of cadets, $70,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I move, in line 222, after the word "dollars," to add as follows:

To be available, and to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War upon plans and detailed specifications to be approved by the academic board.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROGERS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10395) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. WHEELER. No, sir.

The amendments were then agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WHEELER. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMERCE OF NICARAGUA, ETC.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Referring to my message of the 12th of January last, transmitting the final report of the commissioners appointed under the act of July 7, 1884, to visit the states of Central and South America, I have now to submit a special report of Commissioner Thomas C. Reynolds on the condition and commerce of Nicaragua, Honduras, and Salvador.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 5, 1887.

DUTIES ON AMERICAN EXPORTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of State inclosing statement of customs duties levied by foreign nations upon the produce and manufactures of the United States.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 5, 1887.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HERBERT. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the bill (H. R. 7635) to consolidate certain bureaus of the Navy Department, and for other purposes; which was made a special order by the House.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 40, noes 42.

Mr. HERBERT. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. HERBERT and Mr. REED, of Maine, were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 51.

Mr. GOFF. No quorum.

Mr. HERBERT. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 112, nays 60, not voting 149; as follows:

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I am informed by a telegram from my colleague [Mr. DOUGHERTY] that he has been detained on his way to this city by reason of a railroad accident.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

RESIGNATION OF A REPRESENTATIVE.

The SPEAKER. Before the House goes into committee the Chair will lay before the House a communication, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 31, 1886.

SIR: I hereby respectfully resign my office as a Representative in the Forty-ninth Congress for the fifth Congressional district of the State of North Carolina, to take effect from date.

Respectfully, yours,

JAMES W. REID.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The communication was laid on the table.

CONSOLIDATION OF NAVY BUREAUS.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair) for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7635) to consolidate certain bureaus of the Department of the Navy, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 419 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 419. That the business of the Department of the Navy shall, except as otherwise provided by law, be distributed in such manner as the Secretary of the Navy shall judge to be expedient and proper, among the following bureaus:

"First. A bureau of navigation.

"Second. A bureau of ordnance.

"Third. A bureau of medicine and surgery.

"Fourth. A bureau of material, construction, and repair.

"Fifth. A bureau of supplies and accounts."

SEC. 2. That the chief of the bureau of material, construction, and repair may be appointed from civil life or from the active-list of officers of the Navy, who shall be skilled in naval architecture.

SEC. 3. That the chief of the bureau of supplies and accounts shall be appointed from the active-list of officers of the Navy.

SEC. 4. That a chief of bureau appointed from civil life shall have the highest pay of the grade of commodore, and any officer of the Navy below the grade of commodore shall have the rank or relative rank of commodore while filling the office of chief of bureau.

SEC. 5. That the bureau of material, construction, and repair shall contain the following divisions:

First. A division of construction and equipment.

Second. A division of steam-engineering.

SEC. 6. That the bureau of supplies and accounts shall contain the following divisions:

First. A division of supplies and purchases.

Second. A division of accounts and audit.

SEC. 7. That officers assigned to duty as heads of divisions shall, while so serving, have the highest pay of their respective grades.

SEC. 8. That the clerks and other employés authorized by law for the Department of the Navy shall be assigned to duty in said Department as the Secretary may deem expedient: Provided, That there shall be in the bureau of supplies and accounts a chief accountant, at a salary of $2,500 a year.

SEC. 9. That there shall be in the Department of the Navy a board of council, composed of the chiefs of the bureaus of navigation, ordnance, material, construction, and repair, and supplies and accounts, and three officers of the Navy, to be detailed from time to time by the Secretary of the Navy; and officers so detailed shall, while on such duty, receive the highest pay of their respective grades: Provided, That there shall always be a naval constructor and a chief engineer of the Navy members of the board.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Navy shall, ex officio, be president of the board of council; in his absence the senior officer present shall preside.

SEC. 11. That it shall be the duty of the board of council to consider and report upon such questions relating to naval affairs and naval policy as shall be referred to it from time to time by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, however, That the said board shall have no administrative or executive powers whatsoever.

SEC. 12. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 13. That this act shall take effect from and after the 1st day of July, 1886.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask that the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs be read.

The report (by Mr. HERBERT) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred so much of the President's message and the accompanying documents as relates to a reorganization of the Navy Department, have considered the same, and believing its enactment would conduce to economy and efficiency, beg leave to report and recommend the passage of the bill tendered herewith, entitled "A bill to consolidate certain bureaus of the Department of the Navy, and for other purposes."

The present organization of the Navy Department is largely the creature of executive orders and customs, so long acquiesced in that they have almost the force of positive law. This body of orders and customs has grown up around the following skeleton, now section 419 of the Revised Statutes:

"The business of the Department of the Navy shall be distributed in such manner as the Secretary of the Navy shall judge to be expedient and proper among the following bureaus: (1) A Bureau of Yards and Docks; (2) a Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting; (3) a Bureau of Navigation; (4) a Bureau of Ordnance; (5) a Bureau of Construction and Repair; (6) a Bureau of Steam Engineering; (7) a Bureau of Provisions and Clothing; (8) a Bureau of Medicine and Surgery."

Each of these bureaus is independent of the others. Each claims absolute power over the matters within its jurisdiction, subject only to the Secretary of the Navy. The result is that they seem to stand related to each other and to the Secretary in a manner which is precisely analogous to the relations the several Departments of this Government bear to each other and to the President. In other words, these eight bureaus have become eight little Navy Departments. As the business in and about which they are engaged is, to so great an extent, one business, this division of powers and duties brings about many conflicts of authority, and results in much needless expenditure of money.

The testimony on this point of those who have been concerned in the management of the Navy Department, and especially of those who have officially investigated and reported upon its workings, is so uniform and convincing that we can not more clearly illustrate the defects of the present system than by quoting from orders and reports heretofore made.

There may be some difference of opinion as to what the true remedy is, but there seems to be absolute concurrence in the proposition that the evils we have suggested really exist and ought to be provided against.

It will be observed that some have contended, in testimony taken before the committee, that the Secretary has now, under the law, in the exercise of his power to distribute duties as he may deem expedient, ample authority to remedy all existing evils.

It will be seen, however, that the Secretary of the Navy, who has familiarized himself with the law and its operations, does not think he has this power. Indeed, as a question of law simply, it is very doubtful how far the Secretary would have power to consolidate authority which the law has indicated an intention to distribute among separate bureaus.

However this may be, as a simple question of law, the facts will show that, though these evils have often been pointed out, no Secretary has yet been found who has really been equal to the task of correcting them without the aid of Congress.

A former Secretary tried this and failed, and the present Secretary does not believe he is equal to the task.

In our citations we will not go further back than the two Presidential terms preceding this.

Nine years ago, in order to reconcile the conflicts of authority necessarily growing out of the division of the business of the Department among so many independent bureaus, Secretary Thompson resorted to the method shown in the following order:

"United States Navy Regulation Circular No. 1.

"NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 15, 1877.

"The chiefs of bureaus of the Navy Department will meet twice each week, at the hour named by the Secretary of the Navy, who will preside over them as a board. In his absence the senior in rank will do so.

"Each chief of bureau, as directed by the Secretary, will lay before him the actual condition of the affairs of the Bureau; the exact condition of its funds; the supplies on hand; all supplies supposed to be required for its efficiency, and to what extent, and in what manner he proposes to supply them; and any supposed obligation or indebtedness entered into and existing.

"The obtainment of supplies for each bureau; the opening and discussion of bids; the assignment of contracts proposed; the failure of contractors to properly fulfill their contracts; the proposed expenditures of all moneys on estimates, stating their purposes, will be laid before the Secretary by the chief of bureau having cognizance of that branch of the Department, and will be passed upon by him, with the assent of the Secretary. If any other chief of bureau should regard the subject discussed adversely he will state briefly the ground of his dissent, which will be entered upon the record, but will not control in any manner the proposed expenditure appropriated for the bureau concerned.

"Any proposed increase or decrease of the working force at the several navy-yards, of an extensive character, will be discussed, and the reasons given therefor, and passed upon in like manner as above; and instructions will be issued to the commandants of the said navy-yards, when discharges are to be made, to select for discharge those least efficient, and to retain no employés that are not necessary, useful, and effective in their vocation, whether found to be employed by the recommendation of the Department or otherwise.

"A record shall be kept of the proceedings, which will be read and approved by the board at the next meeting.

"R. W. THOMPSON,
"Secretary of the Navy."

In addition to this order he adopted the following rule (see the testimony of Commodore Wilson):

"In case of dissent by a chief of a bureau present at a meeting of the board to the recommendations of another chief of bureau, these two officers, with a third member of the board, were directed by the Secretary to carefully consider the subject and report to him at the next meeting."

Subsequent Secretaries did not consider these orders a solution of the difficulty.

The evils complained of still existed, and under an act of Congress, approved August 5, 1882, the then Secretary of the Navy appointed a commission on navy-yards. This commission consisted of Commodore S. B. Luce, an officer of the line; Chief Engineer Loring, of the staff corps, and Mr. A. B. Mullett, a civilian.

This board made a very thorough and complete investigation of the navy-yards of the United States, and June 6, 1883, made the following recommendation:

"We recommend a reorganization and concentration of the mechanical departments in every navy-yard, so that there shall be but one shop in each for the performance of the same class of work. This involves the following changes: The abolition of all shops doing the usual work of machine-shops, all coppersmiths, all boiler shops, and all foundries except those of steam engineering. Also of all joiner and all paint shops except those of construction.

"We also recommend such a concentration of work, that each of the several articles that form a part of the outfit of every ship shall be made in a single shop, to be established in such yard as may have the best facilities and conveniences therefor. Some of the principal articles being boats, blocks, bags, hammocks, tarpaulins, steam-cutter machinery, engine and boiler mountings, gun-carriages, and gun-fittings.

"We also recommend that whenever there is not, as at present, sufficient work to warrant the expense of maintaining separate shops, all plumbing and iron-plating work be transferred to the coppersmith, machine, and boiler-shops of steam engineering.

"We recommend, further, that at each yard a central steam generating establishment be erected, which shall furnish steam for all motive power and for heating purposes; a great reduction in the cost of fuel and of attendance will unquestionably be secured thereby, as well as greater convenience and efficiency."

The facts found by this commission were of so serious import, and the recommendations made by them were deemed so important, that Secretary Chandler determined to enforce them; so he immediately undertook it. We cite here the material portions of an order he addressed to Commodore Wilson, Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 23, 1883.

SIR: Your attention is called to the "memoranda on the reorganization of the navy-yards, and the disposition proposed to be made of each yard," submitted to the Department by the navy-yard commission in advance of their formal report to Congress.

You will immediately give such orders and make such recommendations to the Department as are necessary to carry into effect, under your bureau, the recommendations of the commission.

You will further examine the "Statistics of Navy-Yards," in Appendix No. 20 to the report of the Department to the President of November 29, 1882 (page 177), and endeavor to discover additional reductions which may be made in the list of civil employés at each navy-yard, whether in your own or any other bureau, and either make or recommend such reductions.

Your attention is specially called to the large number of persons engaged in clerical duties, either as clerks or writers, and you will endeavor to direct or recommend the discharge of some of these.

The statistics referred to show an enormous daily expenditure on the 16th day of November, 1882, namely: For 657 foremen, clerks, and employés, other than ordinary mechanics and workingmen, $2,179.72, and for 3,805 other employés, $9,139.65, making 4,462 total employés at a daily compensation of $11,319.37, or at the rate of over $3,000,000 a year, when the only work in progress on ships of war at all the yards was repairing the Omaha, Shenandoah, Trenton, Ossipee, Mohican, and Alert. This enormous expenditure for such feeble results is inconsistent with faithful administration, and the Department stands pledged that all unnecessary work shall be discontinued, and all employés not needed dismissed. It will be impossible that this pledge shall be carried out unless with the cordial and vigorous co-operation and action of the heads of the Bureaus. You are confidently relied upon to do your part in this work of economy.

Very respectfully,

WM. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Chief Constructor T. D. WILSON,
Chief of Bureau of Construction and Repair.

It will be seen by looking at the evidence of Commodore Wilson, to whom this vigorous letter was addressed, that he replied, giving his objections at length, and he testifies:

"My objections to the order were so forcible that Secretary Chandler delayed carrying it out; in other words, he stated that until I was instructed further, the order would not be put in force in the construction department.

"Q. Then it has never been put in force?

"A. No, sir.

"Q. When was that order made?

"A. As near as my memory serves me, it was about two years ago."

It thus appears that, by reason of the opposition in the Department, and perhaps, also, of inherent difficulties in the way, Secretary Chandler, having no help from Congress, failed in his attempt to accomplish this reform.

After his failure to secure that "cordial and vigorous co-operation and action of the heads of the Bureaus" which he had besought, the Secretary addressed another letter to the commission, and, in their reply, October 11, 1883, they use the following language, portions of which we italicize:

"In the memorandum already referred to, an attempt was made in the direction implied by this inquiry. The scheme for the reorganization of the working force of our navy-yards, as contained in that paper, was the best that could be devised under the circumstances; it was a step toward a concentration of forces and economy and dispatch in the method of doing work. It was submitted in the belief that a fair trial would soon develop whatever was impracticable and lead to proper amendment; and that in a short time the new system would adjust itself so as to run smoothly, as it certainly would economically.

"To a proper understanding of the subject, it should be stated that the present wasteful extravagance in employing so great an excess of non-producers, and the inefficient system of doing business which has for years past been steadily increasing in our navy-yards, is but the natural outgrowth of the constitution of the Navy Department itself. There can be no manner of doubt of this. Each navy-yard is made up of a number of separate and comparatively independent establishments, little principalities, as it were, each owing allegiance to its own sovereign, the chief of the bureau to which it belongs. The heads of departments of a navy-yard have extensive and responsible duties, and a large patronage, and are naturally jealous of the interference of any one but their own chiefs.

"Thus each department has been gradually building itself up so as to be independent of all other departments, and is constantly striving to do all its own work. Each of the principal departments has its own body of artisans, its own machinery, its own steam generators, and its own peculiar method of doing business. As an illustration, we take from official 'schedule of wages' (Form 9) of civil engineer's office, the following ratings: Boiler-makers, boiler-makers' helper, calkers, coopers, cabinet-makers, core-makers, ship-joiners, ship-carpenters, machinists, machinists' helpers, molders, oakum-pickers, and pattern-makers—a little ship-yard in itself.

"In this way it has come that some of our yards are filled up with machinery far beyond their actual needs, and it is no exaggeration to say that there is to-day enough machinery of various kinds in either the New York or Boston yard to do the work of its own particular class of the entire Navy during peace. We habitually speak of a private ship-yard as a 'plant;' but each of our national ship-yards is a segregation of 'plants,' each having its own separate organization, and each its own internal regulations. Many illustrations might be given to show how, through the want of concert of action among these several 'plants,' useless and vexatious delays occur, to say nothing of the waste of time and of public money due to such diffusion.

"To make such radical changes as we proposed in our memorandum was no easy task, nor did we expect that they could be effected without considerable friction, not to say opposition; but supposing the changes to be made on the basis laid down by the commission, it is hardly to be hoped that under present conditions they will be permanent. For whatever changes may be introduced now, and how beneficial soever they may be, still the same causes remaining in active operation must inevitably produce the same results, and in time restore the system of independent plants, with all its attendant evils. Hence we conclude that to organize our navy-yards on a just and permanent basis, to consolidate their several plants, to introduce thrift in the management and promptness in the methods of doing work, with a proper system of accountability; to secure, in short, in each of our yards unification, method, economy, and dispatch, with an administration of its affairs agreeable to the principles of business as understood in civil life, it is absolutely necessary to begin within the Navy Department itself."

The facts given and the reasoning employed in this extract seem conclusively to show that the work of consolidation "should begin within the Navy Department itself." The commission expresses the opinion that unless the reforms they recommend should begin by consolidation in the Navy Department itself "it is hardly to be hoped that under the present conditions they will be permanent," because "the same causes remaining in operation must inevitably produce the same result."

Then we find Secretary Chandler, in his next report, December 1, 1883, using the following language, which we in part italicize:

"It is, however, beyond dispute that methods of naval construction must change with the transition from wooden to steel vessels. It will be found impossible for two independent and equal bureau chiefs to design and supervise the construction of a modern vessel, the one that of the hull and the other that of the machinery, and bring all parts together in one perfect ship, without differences of opinion which can not longer be safely decided by a common superior who does not possess technical skill. The true solution of the conflict is to unite these two bureaus as a single bureau of naval construction, having for its chief the most competent naval architect that can be found, whether among the present officers of the Navy or in civil life."

Again, Secretary Chandler, in his report for 1884, said:

"It is again recommended that the two Bureaus of Construction and Repair and Steam-Engineering be united as a single bureau of naval construction, to have for its chief the most competent naval architect who can be found, whether among the present officers of the Navy or in civil life; and it is further recommended that the equipment work be transferred from the present bureau to such enlarged bureau of construction.

"Elsewhere in this report the necessity is argued of one technical superintending head of each Government workshop at the navy-yards. Even more indispensable will be found one technical head of the construction offices of the Department which are to design the ships and to supervise their construction, whether in private or public shops. The Secretary, the chief constructor, the engineer-in-chief, the chiefs of the Ordnance and Equipment Bureaus, and the advisory board, twelve persons in all, have managed to agree fairly well concerning the designs and the work upon the new cruisers, but this extreme distribution of functions will not answer as a permanent organization."

We have italicized the sentence above in which the former Secretary recommends "that construction and repair and steam-engineering be united in a single bureau," and "that the equipment work be transferred" to the same bureau. This is what has been done, and, in fact, constitutes the most important feature of the bill we report.

To the same effect is the testimony of the distinguished officer who now presides over the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting.

Commodore Schley testifies, on page 24 of the evidence, in reference to a bill more radical in its reforms than that we now recommend:

"I think again the Department is defective in its organization in this particular: The Bureau of Construction and that of Engineering and that of Equipment could be combined, because their duties are to some extent of the same general character. That, of course, could be wiped out and made one bureau."

"By the CHAIRMAN:

"Q. To that extent you agree with the bill?

"A. Perfectly.

"By Mr. BUCK:

"Q. Which three of the bureaus did you name?

"A. Construction, Engineering, and Equipment Bureaus might readily be combined because they appertain, you may say, in the same general way to construction; they all have to do with the construction of ships."

Here we have the somewhat uncommon spectacle of an officer testifying that in the interest of efficiency and economy his own office ought to be abolished.

We witness the same spectacle in the testimony of that other distinguished officer, Commodore Harmony, at present Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, which will be abolished under this bill, as was also proposed in the bill about which he was testifying when he said, on page 19:

"As to the Bureau of Material, Construction, and Repair, that involves the building of ships more particularly than anything else, and the necessity for one head, where everything connected with the building of a ship should be concentrated, must be so clear to the mind of any person who has had anything to do with the construction of great objects that there cannot be a shadow of a doubt of its necessity."

Secretary Whitney is no less emphatic than was Secretary Chandler in urging this reform, both in his report and his evidence.

The following statements, illustrating the working of the present bureau system in the matter of purchases, are taken from the report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1885:

"The open purchases of the Navy Department for the year ending June 30, 1885, amounted to $841,285.84, while the purchases by contract amounted to only a little over a million. A large proportion of the open purchases consisted of articles of either comparatively small value or more or less difficult of classification; but $138,000 of the amount was spent by the seven bureaus, each acting independently of the other, for coal bought—not in one lot, but at one hundred and sixty-six several open purchases (this does not include coal bought by ships on foreign stations); two hundred and ninety-nine different open purchases of stationery were made by eight different bureaus; $121,315.66 was spent for lumber and hardware by six bureaus in four hundred and ninety-nine separate open purchases; seven bureaus spent $46,000 for oils and paints in two hundred and sixty-nine separate purchases; one hundred and seventeen different open purchases of iron and steel were made, at an expense of $41,524.48; $68,881.59 was spent for hemp and cordage in forty-five different open purchases. Eight bureaus supply stationery to ships; three bureaus supply ships with lamps and lanterns. To the same ship one bureau supplys electric lights and the light for general illuminating purposes, another supplies electric search lights, and a third oil and light for the engine and fire rooms.

"Each bureau in the matter of purchases being practically independent of every other, and charged with duties to which these are generally subordinate, with no immediate responsibility to any common head, it is not only not surprising, but it is inevitable that their purchases should be made without the precautions and the judgment and the sagacity which might be expected if that class of duties were confided to an individual selected for the purpose, and upon whom its entire responsibility could be concentrated. With such a concentration of responsibility, the financial operations of the Department would all center at a single point; a system of books would be kept that would show at a glance all the financial transactions of the Department, and at the same time would establish, what is sadly lacking at present, an exhibit of all the property of the Department, for which some one would always be accountable."

The bill we present leaves untouched the discretionary power the Secretary now has in the distribution of the business of the Department among the bureaus authorized by law. But it proposes a different organization. Leaving the Bureaus of Navigation, of Ordnance, and of Medicine and Surgery to remain as now, it abolishes the other five bureaus and creates a bureau of material, construction, and repair, and another of supplies and accounts. Under the first of these will be brought everything relating to the building and equipping a ship except ordnance. We do not propose to disturb that bureau, principally because of the magnitude and importance of the subject-matter involved, and partly in deference to the objections urged against any more radical changes in the organization.

It is clear, also, that if all the other interests concerned in the building and equipment of ships are harmonized and brought under one management, we may expect the relations between this one comprehensive bureau and the Bureau of Ordnance to be much more easily adjusted than has been found to be possible as between Ordnance and the four other bureaus, which were all concerned in this same business of completing a ship.

Especially will this be so when the Secretary finds himself aided in the distribution of business by having a bureau of supplies and accounts, under which he will put all the numerous storehouses and storekeepers, &c., and by the aid of which he will make all payments and purchases and keep account, under one head, of all expenditures.

This consolidation of business under this bureau and the consolidation under the bureau of material, construction, and repair of machine shops, blacksmith shops, head coppersmiths, molders, painters, pattern-makers, engineers, joiners, and of all the other supervisory force now employed under the various bureaus in the navy-yards, will result, we believe, not only in greater efficiency but also in a large saving of expenditures.

Commodore J. G. Walker, in his testimony, makes, at the request of the committee, the following estimate of reduction in clerks and supervisory force in New York navy-yard resulting from the proposed reorganization of the Navy Department.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask for the reading of the minority report.

The Clerk read the views of the minority, as follows:

This bill was prepared as the outcome of the views of the President, expressed in his annual message of December 8, 1885, and of those of the Secretary of the Navy, contained in his report of November 30, 1885, concerning the necessity of a reorganization of the Navy Department.

The President said:

"I deem it my duty to specially direct the attention of Congress to the close of the report of the Secretary of the Navy, in which the humiliating weakness of the present organization of his Department is exhibited, and the startling abuses and waste of its present methods are exposed. The conviction is forced upon us with the certainty of a mathematical demonstration that before we proceed further in the restoration of a navy we need a thoroughly reorganized Navy Department. * * * Every attempt to revive our Navy has thus far, for the most part, been misdirected, and all our efforts in that direction have been little better than blind gropings and expensive, aimless follies."

The Secretary said: "There is something radically wrong with the Department," and "a reform in our organization is indispensable." He asserted that the existing bureaus, (1) Yards and Docks, (2) Equipment and Recruiting, (3) Navigation, (4) Ordnance, (5) Construction and Repair, (6) Steam-Engineering, (7) Provisions and Clothing, (8) Medicine and Surgery, should be legislated out of existence, and the whole busines of these bureaus redistributed under three bureaus only, as follows: (1) the bureau of personnel, (2) the bureau of material and construction, and (3) the bureau of finance and account.

When the Secretary, in pursuance of the foregoing comprehensive programme of reform promulgated by the President and himself, first laid before the committee his proposed bill, it provided for (1) a bureau of personnel; (2) a bureau of material, construction, and repair; (3) a bureau of supplies and accounts; the first to have three subdivisions, (a) of detail and records, (b) hydrography, and (c) medicine and surgery; the second to have three subdivisions, (a) of construction and equipment, (b) steam-engineering, and (c) ordnance; and the third to have two subdivisions, (a) of supplies and purchases, and (b) accounts and audit. It thus provided for three bureaus and eight subbureaus, or eleven in all, in the place of eight equal bureaus.

This first proposed bill having been withdrawn by the Department, it next submitted the bill now reported favorably by the majority of the committee, which establishes bureaus and subbureaus as follows:

"Bureaus.—(1) Navigation; (2) ordnance; (3) medicine and surgery; (4) material, construction, and repair; (5) supplies and accounts.

"Subbureaus.—(6) Construction and equipment, (7) steam-engineering (under bureau of material); (8) supplies and purchases, (9) accounts and audit (under bureau of supplies and accounts)."

Or nine organizations in place of the present eight. If a subdivision of yards and docks, which would seem to be necessary, were to be added, there would be under the reformed method ten organizations instead of the present eight.

It will be noticed that in the Department's second bill the bureau of personnel is omitted. This the Secretary in his report placed as the first of the three new bureaus which would constitute the "natural division of the work of the Department." The first bill proposed to declare by law that the chief of this principal bureau of personnel "shall have charge of the Naval Observatory, the naval asylum, and the naval educational establishments, shall direct the movements and inspection of fleets and of vessels acting singly, shall have charge of all ships in commission, and the correspondence relative thereto, as well as the movements, employment, and instruction of officers and men, and shall keep their records of service."

Under such a provision the President and Secretary of the Navy would be deprived by law of the authority to issue and sign any orders to naval officers, and such orders could only be legally signed by the chief of the bureau.

The Secretary of the Navy sensibly withdrew this feature of his reform organization of the Department which after an experience of nine months he had declared to be one of the indispensable conditions of successful administration. The Secretary also in his first bill abolished the Bureau of Navigation, and changed the Bureau of Ordnance (under a new name of "director of ordnance") and the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery from independent bureaus to mere divisions of other bureaus. His second bill now restores these three bureaus as independent bureaus and abandons that feature of his first bill.

The Secretary's wise abandonment of the foregoing parts of this reorganization plan operates strongly with the minority of the committee in inducing them to oppose the passage of any bill for the radical reorganization of the Navy Department at the present session. If the Secretary has determined that more than one-third of his plan is injudicious it is quite probable that further reflection and additional experience gained in another year's conduct of his Department may lead him to conclude that the adoption of the two other thirds would be an injury instead of a benefit to the Navy. If he has already become convinced that the eight independent bureaus which he at first felt must certainly be reduced to three can not be reduced below five, may not further reflection convince him that the other three should be retained? It will be easier a year later to adopt his ripened proposals under these two heads than it will be to undo any mischief which may result from the hasty acceptance by Congress of the opinions of the Secretary concerning the natural divisions of the work of the Department which have been so frankly and judiciously admitted by him to have been incomplete and immature.

The eight bureaus of the Navy Department are the growth of many years of experience. With them the Department successfully managed the Navy during the war of the rebellion. The four staff Bureaus of Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, Provisions and Clothing, and Medicine and Surgery represent four different corps of naval officers, which have existed some of them nearly a century, and the chief of each bureau, whether the senior officer or not, has generally been recognized as the head for the time being of his corps. To annihilate these bureaus or to place them under line officers as chiefs would be justly regarded as doing great injustice to the various staff corps, and would revive dissensions that could not fail to work incalculable mischief to the Navy. The attempt has been given up as to the Medical Corps. The question presented to Congress by the proposed bill is whether it shall be persisted in as to the naval constructors, naval engineers, and paymasters.

The bill provides that the chief of the Bureau of Material, Construction, and Repair shall be appointed from civil life or from the active-list of officers of the Navy, and that the Chief of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts shall be appointed from the active-list of officers of the Navy. The present chiefs of the bureaus now corresponding to the proposed new bureaus and subbureaus are, as they must by law be, a naval constructor, a naval engineer, and a paymaster. The proposed bill creates two new bureaus and their four subdivisions, at the head of which it would be possible to place officers of even the lowest junior grade on the active-list of the Navy.

In opposing the transfer of these two staff bureaus to line control the minority of the committee do not wish to be understood as in any way antagonizing the line of the Navy. The line officers are the commanding officers and the present list embraces officers of the highest culture, capacity, and distinction. They should be sustained and strengthened in the possession of the functions, honors, and emoluments which legitimately belong to them.

But equal justice should be extended to the staff officers, and their appropriate field to work should not be encroached upon by the line. In time of peace, with insufficient work for the Navy to do, the line may be tempted to crowd over into the domain of the construction, engineering, and pay corps, and even to incline to eliminate some or all of them from the establishment. Such a disposition and tendency is a mistake. In time of war the line are wanted for their dangerous and important executive duties, and indeed would not be willing to be withdrawn from them to build ships, run engines, or purchase or handle provisions, clothing, and supplies. As the staff officers referred to are indispensable in time of war, they must be protected and respected in time of peace, as they might not be if they and their bureaus are made subordinate to officers outside of their own corps, placed between them and all connection or communication with the Secretary of the Navy. What reason can there be to suppose that the condition of the Pay Corps will be improved simply by placing it under a line chief of a bureau of supplies and accounts, with two line chiefs of the divisions of supplies and purchases and accounts and audits? What will be the probable effect upon the professional pride and zeal of the naval constructors and naval engineers if they are placed under a naval captain, chief of a bureau charged with the whole work of building, equipping, and repairing the hulls and engines of all men-of-war, while their own distinctive bureaus are abolished and their functions subordinated. Yet these results are probable under the proposed bill, and the minority of the committee believe they are intended by its authors.

The proposed bill, it is true, in form allows the bureau of material, construction, and repair to be placed under a chief from civil life, with the pay of a commodore, namely, $5,000 per year. But the minority are by no means persuaded that any civilian naval architect, competent to be put over the heads of all the present constructors and engineers, is to be found in the country, and if there were such a one his services could not be secured for $5,000 per year.

The minority are not averse to improved methods of administration and organization in the Navy Department, to be effected by the voluntary action of the Secretary, or even by mandatory legislation if necessary, provided the evil to be remedied is clearly seen to be in existence and the proposed remedy seems likely to be effective. It is common, and may be admissible under some circumstances, for professed reformers to grossly exaggerate the evils they seek to cure. But such a method of achieving reform is hardly open to public officials of as high position as that of the President and Secretary of the Navy. The assertion by the former that the Navy Department is simply "a shabby ornament to the Government," and the declaration of the latter that the whole organization of the Department is vicious, and that all the eight bureaus must be swept away at one blow, and three new bureaus, with entirely new names and with anomalous and enormous powers, must be established, is a misconception of facts and remedies which has alarmed the whole service, and should be carefully scrutinized by Congress before accepting it.

Some inconveniences have been, from time to time, pointed out in naval administration, mainly those growing out of the continual repairing and reproducing of old wooden ships. But during nearly half a century of organization under a simple and natural subdivision of the business among several bureaus, the head of each of which has been the immediate agent of the Secretary, responsible directly and only to him, no suggestion has ever been made that the whole organization has been fundamentally wrong, or that it has been solely responsible for what faults of administration have occurred. It was reserved for the present Secretary of the Navy, immediately after entering the Department and without any experience of its workings, to discover that its ancient organization was radically and fatally vicious; that the eight bureaus were all bad, and that the true natural division of the work should be among three bureaus, one of personnel, one of material, and a third of finance.

On this point the Secretary testified before the committee as follows:

"Q. This bill proposes a very radical change in the methods of the Department. As the result of the observation you have made in the past year of the working of the Department, do you feel entire confidence in recommending this radical change in the system?

"The SECRETARY. I do; yes, sir; I think it is the natural system for doing business.

"Q. Have your opinions in that regard been formed by your own personal observation during the time you have been in the office, or by reference to the views or recommendations expressed to you during the past by others?

"The SECRETARY. Well, as I remarked before, my views were formed from observation. I think an outsider coming into a department like the Navy, if he is a person who has had anything to do with business, has this advantage, that a thing strikes him more readily than it does a man accustomed to routine. As I said before, my views began to form from my observation in regard to the manner in which the navy-yard work was done, and then up through the Department, the way in which the Secretary was left alone. It was largely observation that formed my views.

"Q. Did you organize a board for the purpose of considering this reorganization?

"The SECRETARY. No, sir; not on this subject at all.

"Q. I was under the impression they had considered this subject. What was the subject-matter of the consideration of that board?

"The SECRETARY. That was with regard to the personnel of the bureaus—the way in which the work was done, the character of the clerks, their official positions, and so on.

"Q. This is a proposition, as I understand, to reorganize the Department under three distinct heads. To your knowledge, has that system ever been recommended in any official way prior to your report of December last?

"The SECRETARY. I do not know that it has, but it is a system that is in general use everywhere but here.

"Q. I am speaking about our own service, whether there ever has been any official recommendation in our service.

"The SECRETARY. I do not know of any other, but you will find that in other countries there is the same general distribution of functions into these three branches, and the organization is on that basis."

Commodore J. G. Walker testified as follows:

"Q. When was your attention first called to this plan—this specific method of having three heads in the Department—do you remember?

"A. I don't remember when it was first talked of, but I should say last summer.

"Q. Have you ever recommended anything of that specific character in the past year?

"A. I have been in favor of this——

"Q. Have you ever recommended it officially?

"A. No, sir; not officially; I have recommended it in conversation.

"Q. Do you know of any public recommendation of this plan or any official recommendation of it prior to the Secretary's report last December?

"A. Not carrying it to this extent.

"Q. I mean this specific plan.

"A. I think many officers of the Navy have been in favor of some consolidation of the bureaus in the Navy Department for many years past; but I do not know that any one has recommended consolidation to the extent that this bill proposes."

Nothing whatever was shown to the committee in proof of the assertion that the navy department of any nation is organized on the principle of three natural divisions—bureaus of personnel, material, and finance. The Secretary and his associates are entitled to the credit of having invented the plan.

Nearly all the evils recited by the Secretary in his reports are evils not of organization but of administration, and can be corrected by energetic and persistent attempts on his part.

One of the instances given by him is as follows:

"In the summer of 1883 an order was given for sixty-one thousand dollars' worth of canvas to a person who was not a dealer in the article and at a time when there was the usual supply of canvas on hand.

"Under an order made by Secretary Thompson in 1877 it was understood that the limit of any single purchase under a 'certificate of necessity' was $500. For purchases involving a larger amount resort must be had to the ordinary contract system. Several months were consumed in the delivery of this sixty-one thousand dollars' worth of canvas, and the bills were made out in sums of less than $500 each. The 'certificate of necessity' accompanied each one, and in that form the bills passed the Treasury Department.

"Two or three of these bills, with the bureau officer's certificate of necessity upon them, would sometimes be dated and presented on the same day.

"During the same year coal was purchased by different paymasters from the same person on or about the same days, deliverable at the very same place, of like quality and character, but at prices differing from 50 to 65 cents a ton.

"It is idle to suppose that abuses of the character I have glanced at can be prevented merely by a change in the personnel of the Department. It is the system that is vicious."

Clearly the Secretary was mistaken in supposing the abuses so related by him were due to a vicious system. They arose from neglect or failure or misconception of the law and order of the Secretary on the part of the officers making the purchases.

A marked instance of the exaggeration by the Secretary of the condition of his Department is contained in the following statement in his report:

"I have taken measures to obtain a complete inventory of the stock on hand in our various navy-yards and stations. It is the first that has been made in seven years. In view of the defective system under which the Navy Department has been allowed to drift during the last twenty years I was not greatly surprised to discover that the stock on hand fails to agree with the amounts shown by the books of the Department. In some cases it is largely in excess, in others there is a deficiency."

When writing the above severe indictment of the navy system the Secretary appears to have been in complete ignorance of section 2 of the naval appropriation act of August 5, 1882, which required as follows:

"SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy, as soon as may be after the passage of this act, to cause an account to be taken of the stock of stores and supplies pertaining and belonging to the several bureaus of the Navy Department, in which account shall be stated the original cost of each article and the date of purchase, so far as the same is known, and cause an appraisement of the present value of such stores and supplies to be made and entered in such account; and said appraised value, when so entered, shall hereafter be the price at which they shall be charged in accounting with the several bureaus. Such appraisal shall be made by boards of officers of the Navy to be designated by the Secretary; and all such stores and supplies as shall be found by boards of appraisers to be unserviceable for use in the Navy shall be condemned and sold in the manner hereinafter provided for the sale of old materials, and the proceeds thereof, after deducting the cost of such appraisal, condemnation, and sale, shall be paid into the Treasury. And no old material of the Navy shall hereafter be sold or exchanged by the Secretary of the Navy, or by any officer of the Navy, which can be profitably used by reworking or otherwise in the construction or repair of vessels, their machinery, armor, armament, or equipment, but the same shall be stored and preserved for future use. And when any such old material can not be profitably used as aforesaid, the same shall be appraised and sold at public auction after public notice and advertisement shall have been given according to law under such rules and regulations and in such manner as the said Secretary may direct. The net proceeds arising from the sale of such old materials shall be paid into the Treasury. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy annually to report in detail to Congress, in his annual report, the proceeds of all sales of materials, stores, and supplies made under the provisions of this act, and the expenses attending such sales."

It further appears by the reply of the Secretary of January 4, 1886, to a resolution of the Senate (Senate Ex. Doc. No. 23, 49th Cong., 1st sess.), that the accounts and appraisals required by the law of August 5, 1882, had been carefully and fully made, and the Secretary says:

"So far as the Department is advised, no part of the requirement of the law was not complied with except as to reporting to Congress, in detail, the proceeds of all sales of material, stores, and supplies made under its provisions. Such reports were made in general statements in annual reports of the Department, and an account of the deposits into the Treasury for the sales published in the annual Book of Estimates."

Congress could hardly have intended by using the word "detail" that the name and description of every article sold should be reported to Congress. The fact that the Secretary did not even know that the inventory had been taken when he made his report, suggests that he may be mistaken as to other charges upon which he arraigns the system of departmental organization which prevailed when he entered office. Further time, investigation, and reflection may additionally modify his views concerning the system, and opportunity for this should be allowed him by suitable delay on the part of Congress in acting on his sweeping propositions for so-called reform legislation.

A bureau of accounts or a division of accounts and audit is entirely unnecessary. The Secretary in his report, and a majority of the committee, urge the desirability of the concentration of the duties of purchasing and handling naval supplies; but not one word is uttered by either showing the need of any different system of accounts and audits from that now existing. Purchases may be made by the different bureaus as now; or by simple order of the Secretary there may be concentration of the purchases in the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, at the head of which is a member of the Pay Corps, and the officers of which corps now make all the purchases for the Navy not made directly by the chiefs of the bureaus. In either event the present system of accounting is sufficient and nearly perfect. Appropriations are made by Congress in detail for each bureau. Each bureau is responsible for the expenditure of the moneys belonging to it, keeps full, accurate, and elaborate accounts, and can at a moment's notice inform the Secretary of the Navy of its financial condition, its balances of money, and property on hand. In addition, duplicate accounts of all the transactions of each bureau are to be found in the office of the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, who, with his 44 clerks, does no other business except watch the naval expenditure and audit the naval accounts. To establish a bureau or a division of a bureau solely to audit the accounts of naval expenditures would be a needless triplication of entries and records. Its establishment could only be justified if either the Fourth Auditor or the Secretary of the Navy were to be formally legislated out of existence, which steps neither the Secretary nor the majority of the committee propose. The whole outcry that the system of naval accounting is imperfect and that a bureau or division of accounts and audits is required is frivolous and baseless.

It is said that economy of expenditure is to be promoted by the proposed new organization of the Navy Department. This may well be doubted. If there are now many cases in which two men are employed to do one man's work, and by consolidation of bureaus one-half such employés are to be discharged, there will be a gain. But if of the present employés each does a day's work consolidation will effect no reduction. The same work will still remain to be done, and the same number will be required to do it. The minority are skeptical about the reduction of 33 per cent. in the clerks and supervisory force in the navy-yards, which it is claimed in the estimate prepared by Commodore J. G. Walker will be accomplished by the proposed consolidation of bureaus. The promise is more than the performance is likely to be. An analysis of the estimate would show that some of the reductions can not be made, that some can be made without consolidation, and that the useful net reduction from that cause will be slight.

The promoters of the bill, while very free to promise reductions of a few leading low-paid mechanics at the navy-yards, have not shown that any reduction is to be expected, but rather an increase of high-salaried employés, from the consolidation of bureaus. There are now eight chiefs of bureaus; the first proposed reorganization bill required eleven chiefs of bureaus and divisions, and also a chief accountant; the present proposed bill requires nine chiefs and the chief accountant, or ten officers where there are now eight.

The following table shows the clerks and supervisory force within the Navy Department, none of which are to be reduced or dispensed with in case of the proposed consolidation of bureaus:

Bureau.	Chief.	Total force.
Bureau of Navigation	John G. Walker	103
Bureau of Ordnance	M. Sicard	11
Bureau of Medicine	F. M. Gunnell	9
Bureau of Construction	No present chief	8
Bureau of Steam Engineering	C. H. Loring	16
Bureau of Provision and Clothing	No chief	13
Bureau of Yards and Docks	D. B. Harmony	9
Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting	W. S. Schley	12
Secretary's office		36

The minority would be very glad to see an estimate of the reduction in the above force to result from the proposed reorganization of the Navy Department.

The minority regret to notice that the majority of the committee have omitted from their proposed reorganization what the Secretary in his report says should be an "essential feature" of the system of organization indicated by him, namely, an Assistant Secretary of the Navy. This essential feature of the Secretary's plan is the only one which would be agreed to by Congress with substantial unanimity, and yet it is the only one which was left out of the bill first prepared, and it is also left out of the present bill. An Assistant Secretary would be a valuable addition to the civilian representation in the Department now depending substantially upon the Secretary alone. In this connection the minority call attention to the annexed letter of a former Secretary, dated January 16, 1883, giving reasons why the Department should have an Assistant Secretary.

The minority therefore are opposed to the passage at this time of the bill reported for the reasons stated:

(1) Because it follows and is intended to be a justification and vindication of sweeping and baseless aspersions upon the whole organization of the Navy Department as it has existed during the last half century.

(2) Because the bill is intended to place all the bureaus of the Navy Department under the control of one branch of the service, and thus to impair the dignity and independence of the corps of naval constructors, naval engineers, and paymasters, which would be likely to prove a deadly blow at the peace and prosperity of the naval establishment.

(3) Because the bill does not decrease but increases the number of high officials to be engaged in conducting the business of the Department, and because there is no sufficient reason for believing that it will result in the economy and reform predicted.

(4) Because the bill does not provide for an Assistant Secretary of the Navy, who should be an essential feature of any improved organization, in order that the Secretary may be supplemented and aided in maintaining full civilian influence in the Department. The action contemplated if the present bill passes will diminish civilian control to the lowest point possible without abolishing the office of Secretary.

C. A. BOUTELLE.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 16, 1883.

SIR: I have the honor to state the reasons why there should be an Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

The peculiar and appropriate duties of the Secretary are more than can be continuously and efficiently performed by one person. He needs an assistant to aid him at all times in investigating and directing the affairs of the Department, to sign regularly a portion of the correspondence and orders, and to act as the head of the Department during the occasional necessary absence of the Secretary. Economically it would be cheaper to employ an Assistant Secretary and to dispense with the services of lower subordinates receiving salaries equal to his.

But the important need of an Assistant Secretary is to strengthen civil influence in a Department constituted almost entirely of naval officers with military habits and opinions, and holding life commissions. There are about 2,500 officers, receiving about five millions in annual salaries, and expending annually over fifteen millions of the public money. This great establishment is not commanded by a supreme military captain, also with a life commission, but is, according to our republican Constitution, controlled by the President, who comes for a limited period from civil life, and for the time being as commander-in-chief is supposed to direct the Navy wisely and impartially for the national interests and according to the will of the people as expressed from time to time in the laws of Congress.

This control and direction the President is supposed to exercise solely through a Secretary of the Navy, who is also taken temporarily from civil life, and is a civil and not military officer. The Secretary acts through the Navy Department with eight bureaus, all of whose acts are by law his acts, as his acts are by law the acts of the President. How are these bureaus organized? Every one is headed by a naval officer.

There is, in addition, a solicitor, nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, who is an accomplished major in the Marine Corps, and has acquired an excellent knowledge of the general principles of law by studying since he became a marine officer, but has never practiced law. The sole civilian assistants of the Secretary are the chief clerk and a few other subordinate clerks.

In the whole establishment there is no lawyer but the Secretary himself. When he ventures away there is no civil authority left except that of the conservative chief clerk; and he can not become the acting Secretary, but a naval officer must be made such.

Thus has conformity to the constitutional theory concerning the direction of the Navy been reduced to a minimum.

The situation in the War Department, if I may properly refer to it, is even worse than in the Navy Department, because it is so much larger; and therein 2,500 Army officers, receiving annually salaries of six millions and disbursing forty-five millions of public money, are expected to be efficiently ordered by a secretary and chief clerk, with no other civilian legal aid and with no other civil assistants except subordinate clerks. It is remarkable that while all the other Departments have retained their assistants—three in the State Department, three in the Post-Office Department, three in the Department of Justice, two in the Treasury, and one in the Interior Department—the Assistant Secretaries of War and of the Navy have been gradually eliminated from those Departments, and each Secretary, with only a chief clerk, been instructed by Congress to do his best to fairly and judiciously adjudicate between rival officers and contending corps, and to control and wisely and legally manage an overgrown and expensive military establishment.

It might be better to reverse our theory and entirely withdraw the civilian Secretaries and give supreme military control to the General of the Army and Admiral of the Navy. But I hesitate not to say that the real public interests require a return to the traditional policy and the placing in each Department of a Secretary, one or more assistant secretaries, and a solicitor learned in the law, to be taken from the ablest men in civil life whom liberal salaries will secure.

In 1865 the present Secretary entered the Navy Department as its solicitor. Mr. Wells was Secretary, Mr. Fox Assistant Secretary, and Mr. Faxon, chief clerk. Civil influence did not even then seem to me to be unduly dominant. Now it depends solely on the chief clerk and myself.

The delay in appointing an Assistant Secretary arises entirely from the difficulty of making a suitable selection.

Very respectfully,

WM. E. CHANDLER.

Hon. FRANK HISCOCK;
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SAYERS obtained the floor.

Mr. HERBERT. As it is getting late I ask the gentleman from Texas to yield to me, that I may move that the committee rise.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HERBERT. Did the Clerk read how many signatures were appended to the views of the minority?

Mr. BOUTELLE. He read two good names.

Mr. HERBERT. And only two. They are signed by only two members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee should now rise, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] will be entitled to the floor when the committee resumes the consideration of the bill.

The motion of Mr. HERBERT was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HATCH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7635) to consolidate certain bureaus of the Department of the Navy, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

PHILIP STOTSENBERG.

Mr. LORE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10410) for the relief of Philip Stotsenberg, late a private in Company K, Fortieth Pennsylvania Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID R. LINTON.

Mr. HITT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10411) for the relief of David R. Linton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HERBERT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 6, 1887.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

JOHN P. JONES, a Senator from the State of Nevada, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of Edwin Hoyt, of West Addison, Vt., praying for the passage of a law extending the time for filing pension claims; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the executive committee of the Grand Lodge, Independent Order of Good Templars of Vermont, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 1579) touching the sale of liquor in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the petition of Rev. John H. Elliott, Hon. Edmund H. Bennett, and Hon. J. C. Bancroft Davis, a committee of the general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, acting in behalf of that convention, praying Congress to provide for obtaining statistics of marriage and divorce. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, who had the matter under consideration at the last session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition of the State Grange of California, praying for the passage of the Hatch experiment-station bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion, praying for legislation to enable them to wear the insignia of the order when in uniform and while on duty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of James A. Garfield Post, No. 34, Department of California, Grand Army of the Republic, praying for the passage of the so-called Edmunds-Tucker bill in relation to Mormonism in Utah; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SPOONER presented resolutions adopted by the State Grange of Wisconsin, urging Congress to agree upon an interstate-commerce bill; also, that the public domain be disposed of only to actual settlers, and demanding that Congress pass laws that will put a stop to the entry and purchase of large tracts of land by aliens; also, favoring the passage of a bill making the Commissioner of Agriculture a member of the President's Cabinet; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the State Grange of Wisconsin, favoring the passage of the Hatch experimental station bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BLAIR. I present numerous memorials remonstrating against the violation of the Sabbath by the running of railway trains and the performance of public work upon the Sabbath, and praying for the enactment of laws prohibiting such violation on the part of the Postmaster-General's Department and in the transaction of the business of interstate commerce and the War and Navy Departments. These memorials are signed by many of the ablest and best women and men in the country. They are very numerous from all parts of the country. They are signed by Julius H. Seelye, president of Amherst College and ex-member of Congress; Joseph Cook, lecturer and pastor, of Boston, Mass.; George H. Vibbert, of Boston; Rev. J. O. Peck, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church of New Haven, Conn.; J. F. Shorey, superintendent of the McAuly mission of New York city; James H. Kellogg, member of the New York State Temperance Society; Frances E. Willard, of Evanston, Ill., president of the National Women's Christian Temperance Union; Mary B. Willard, Mrs. Elizabeth W. Andrews; Charles E. S. Fielden and Ruby I. Gilbert, editors and managers of the Union Signal; William J. Batt; J. C. Bateham, national superintendent of the Women's Christian Temperance Union for Sabbath Observance; O. G. Peters, of the Columbus Buggy Company, of Columbus, Ohio; and various others, a large number in all, praying for the passage of laws in the direction I have indicated.

I also present petitions making the same prayer from the following State unions: The Women's Christian Temperance Union of New Jersey, representing 6,000 members; of Indiana, representing 2,500; of Massachusetts, representing 6,000; of Delaware, representing 8,000; of Illinois, representing 9,000; of Iowa, representing 6,000; of Pennsylvania, representing 6,000; of Dakota, representing 1,000, and of the National Women's Christian Temperance Union, 200,000, signed by officers of the national and various other unions.

I have here making the same prayer a petition from the Northern New York Methodist Conference, signed by Bishop Warren and prominent men in that body, as well as officially by the conference; also by vote of their organizations from the Ohio Women's Christian Temperance Union, with 4,000 members, the first district of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, with 450 members, and the Lake County Union, with 150 members; also, the Kansas State Women's Christian Temperance Union, with 2,192 members, the Emporia Union, with 60 members, the sixth district, with 500 members, and the fifth district, with 1,000 members. From Wisconsin, official indorsement by vote of their organization from the State Women's Christian Temperance Union, with 2,000 members, the second Congressional district convention; also, the sixth district and the eighth district, and convention of Independent Order of Odd-Fellows, all signed by officers of these various organizations and many others. Also, from California, official indorsement by vote of their organizations from the State Women's Christian Temperance Union, with 3,000 members; the Brentwood Union, with 31, and Antioch Union, with 34 members, the Brentwood Methodist church, with 50, and Christian with 120 members, and other ministers and teachers from Antioch; also, by the official indorsement by vote of their organizations from most of the leading denominations of the country; the presbytery of New York; the General Congregational Association of Ohio; the Lexington Methodist Episcopal Conference, representing Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois; the General Congregational Association of Michigan; the United Presbyterian Presbytery of Michigan; the General Congregational Association of Dakota; the Dakota annual conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the general assembly of the United Presbyterian Church of North America, with 87,637 church members, eight different orders in all. Other large bodies, notably the National Congregational Council and the American Sunday School Union, voted approval, but failed to authorize the signatures.

I have here another, from New Hampshire, containing official indorsement byorder of their organizations from the State Sunday School Association with 54,554 members, the Methodist churches of Concord, Bristol, and Littleton, with names of educators and prominent men. I present another petition from Michigan containing the official indorsement by vote of their organizations from the State Women's Christian Temperance Union with 6,300 members, the Grand Rapids District Association of the Methodist Episcopal Conference Women's Missionary Society, also the Women's Missionary Society of the Big Rapids District Conference, and the Grand Traverse District Conference; also from New Hampshire, by official indorsement by vote of their organizations, from the Yearly Meeting of Free-will Baptists, with 8,732 members, the State Young Men's Christian Association, and the State Women's Christian Temperance Union, with 1,400 members.

I also present a petition from Eskridge, Kans., containing the official indorsement of vote of their organizations, of the Methodist Episcopal church with 150 members, the Congregational with 50 members, the Baptist, the Reformed Presbyterian, 80 members, with many names of prominent men, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and the Foreign Missionary Society, very largely and numerously signed.

I move the reference of these petitions in the first instance to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I desire to add to my statement with reference to the petitions which I have just presented, that all the petitions are signed by the same parties and the petitions are united, and they set forth as their respectful petition to Congress, "to pass a law instructing the Postmaster-General to make no further contracts which shall include the carriage of the mails on the first day of the week, and to provide that hereafter no mail matter shall be collected or distributed on that day;" second, that Congress will enact laws "to forbid interstate commerce on the first day of the week by railroad trains;" and third, that laws may be enacted "to forbid military drills, musters, and parades of the United States cadets, soldiers, and marines on the first day of the week, in times of peace, as interfering not only with the soldier's right to the day of rest but also with his right of conscience."

Being applied to, I have written to the parties interested in these petitions and who desire a hearing, that probably as the matter was so important and the movement so extensive it would be impossible to have a hearing to their satisfaction during the present session, and I suppose the matter will be postponed until another Congress. Therefore I moved, as the general subject seems to be proper for the considertion of the Committee on Education and Labor, that in the first instance these petitions be sent to that committee. Evidently, if action should be taken, there must be subsequently a report recommending that these various remedial suggestions be referred to their appropriate committees.

Mr. EVARTS. I present the petition of J. Henry Koennecke and 43 other citizens of New York city and Brooklyn, N. Y., praying for a reduction of the special taxes and for the repeal of the "obnoxious, prohibitory, and monopolistic features" of the oleomargarine bill. As that subject has been in charge of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I move that the petition be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented the petition of Mrs. Annie H. Martindale, president of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of the State of Delaware, and other ladies, officers of that association, praying for the passage of the Blair educational bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CALL. I present the petition of the executive committee of the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Good Templars, State of Florida, on behalf of a membership of six hundred I. O. of G. T's of the State, asking for the favorable consideration and early passage of the bill (S. 1579) granting to the people of the District of Columbia the right to determine by ballot whether intoxicating liquors may hereafter be legally manufactured and sold in said District or not. I move its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations with the accompanying papers.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on the Library, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2636) to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed, or rather authorized informally, by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 755) to refer the claims of the Eastern and Western bands of Cherokee Indians to the Court of Claims, to report it back and ask that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged, and that the bill and papers be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the same in respect of the bill (S. 375) to refer the claims of the Eastern and Western bands of Cherokee Indians to the Court of Claims. The matter was before the Committee on Indian Affairs at a former session, and under the law was sent to the Court of Claims for a report, which was made. By accident the bills and reports were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, while they should have gone to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I move that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of both these bills, and that they, with the papers, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ALBION S. KEITH.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1085) for the relief of Albion S. Keith to report it favorably; and I am also instructed by the committee to make a brief statement to the Senate and ask for the passage of the bill at this time.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the bill be read in full.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas Albion S. Keith, late a naval cadet in the United States Navy, having successfully passed his final examination for graduation, and being found mentally, morally, and professionally qualified for promotion to the rank of ensign, has been, however, found physically disqualified for promotion by reason of a disease contracted from exposure in the line of duty at sea, which entirely disables him, and because of which he was honorably discharged: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint the said Albion S. Keith an ensign in the United States Navy on the retired-list.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senate will indulge me in a brief statement and there is then the slightest objection I shall not press the bill. It had passed the House just before the recess upon the simple statement which I am about to make, and if the Senate does not agree with me, of course I will put it upon the Calendar.

This cadet graduated in 1883 among the very first cadets in his class, a very promising young man in every respect, of whom the Academy, according to the letter of the superintendent, had great expectations. I was one of the visitors that year, and my special attention was called by the faculty to the promise of this young man.

He was put to sea under the regulation which requires two years' service at sea, and when abroad was taken with inflammatory rheumatism. His quarters were in a very exposed position in the ship. He lay there and the surgeon of the ship did not seem to be aware of the perilous condition he was in, and, without reflecting upon the surgeon, he was wofully neglected. He tried to get permission to be sent to a hospital in the foreign port, but for reasons that were satisfactory to the surgeon, the surgeon insisted upon keeping him on board the ship. He was kept under a promise that when they got to a better port he would be put in a foreign hospital, but at that time when the surgeon of the vessel came to examine him he found him, to his utter astonishment, a perfect wreck. He was brought out of the vessel and sent home by a special steamer, and is now the most perfect wreck that ever one saw in the world.

He came home and on his bed was examined at the end of the two years, and then passed, under those circumstances, the twelfth in a class of forty-three. But they have been obliged to discharge him from the service because of his utter wreck. He is upon crutches and has to be helped from door to door, and there is no prospect of his ever being better, and he probably will not live more than a very brief time.

All of the departments recommend that he should be an ensign retired. Technically under the law which was passed that very year those who graduate in the four years' course must serve two years at sea before they get a commission. That is the reason why he is not put upon the retired-list without action of Congress.

The Secretary of the Navy, the Superintendent of the Academy, the surgeon, the commander of the ship, and all join in saying that justice requires that he be put where he would have been if he had had the commission of ensign.

I ask that the bill may be considered now.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 3083) for the relief of Louisa A. Ingram; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (S. 3084) for the protection of the morals of minors in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. VANCE. There is accompanying the bill a petition from citizens of this District containing some valuable statistics with reference to crime, destitution, &c., among the children of the District. I ask unanimous consent that the petition may be printed along with the bill for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the order will be made.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 3085) for the relief of the legal representatives of Chauncy M. Lockwood, for extra mail service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3088) to grant a right of way through the public-land strip to the Chicago, Kansas and Western Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 93) providing for the sale of the United States map; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Printing.

KILLING OF CAPTAIN CRAWFORD.

Mr. MANDERSON. January 19, 1886, during the last session of Congress, I introduced a resolution asking the Committee on Foreign Relations to make investigation concerning the killing of Captain Crawford, late of the United States Army, by Mexican troops. This killing occurred during the month of January, 1886. The Senate has not yet been favored with anything in the nature of a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and in view of an investigation had by the State Department and investigation also made by the War Department the committee has probably thought that such report was not needed.

Preparatory to introducing a bill looking to the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of this gallant officer, which bill I propose to refer to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I should like to call their attention, with the consent of the Senate, to certain statements of fact made in the last report of the Secretary of War. It seems to me that they will show to that committee and to the Senate a case of exceeding hardship and one that calls for the character of relief provided for by the bill. The Secretary of War in reference to this matter says:

In the execution of the Lieutenant-General's instructions to pursue, capture, or destroy the hostiles under Geronimo, a sad and unexpected encounter with a body of Mexican troops, said to have been pursuing the same object, led to the death of Captain Crawford. He was a soldier of great endurance, energy, and courage; admirably fitted for the work he had undertaken. His untimely end in an obscure skirmish, and in the very act of calling a parley, is sadly to be deplored as a loss to the Army and the country.

Passing the recital of facts connected with the pursuit of the hostiles, I read further along in the report:

During the pursuit Captain Crawford had given them no rest, and had exhibited perseverance and intelligence in the highest degree. The Indians were dispirited and worn out by his pursuit, and finding him close upon their trail, and knowing his character and ability, there is little room to doubt that the result of the meeting between Crawford and Natchez would have been the absolute surrender of the hostiles and the closing of this campaign, so full of all that makes Indian wars horrible.

But the meeting was not destined to occur. Early on the morning of the 11th a body of Mexican soldiers attacked Crawford's camp, wounding one of our scouts. The officers succeeded in stopping our return fire in about fifteen minutes, and Captain Crawford and an interpreter, Mr. Horn, went forward for a parley. While it was in progress, suddenly, and without warning, the Mexicans opened fire, wounding Captain Crawford mortally and the interpreter in the arm. The Mexicans continued to fire for an hour and a half, and only consented to reply to our officers after it was evident they could not capture our position. Captain Crawford and his officers all wore uniforms, but without insignia of rank. The general opinion of the white men with Crawford's command was that they must have known that Crawford was a white man and soldier of the United States. The Mexicans were irregular and not national troops, and asserted that they were following the trail of the hostiles, and seeing the Indian scouts thought they were the Indians they were pursuing.

Mr. President, I read this extract for the purpose of showing that the charges made in the report of Lieutenant Maus and presented by me to the Senate in February last were statements of truth and fact. I now desire to call the attention of the Committee on Foreign Relations to the remarkable character of the claim or demand that has been made on the Mexican Government in this matter.

The only claim thus far made on the part of the United States is based upon the proceedings of a board of survey, which found that, on the day following the engagement in which Crawford was killed, Lieutenant Maus was "compelled by these irregular Mexican troops to turn over to them a number of mules and their equipments under circumstances which rendered it quite impracticable for him to have done otherwise." The report of Lieutenant Maus is published with the reports of General Crook.

So it appears from this report of the Secretary of War that the only claim made on the Mexican government is in the nature of indemnity for the mules taken from the officer who succeeded to the command of our troops after the killing of Captain Crawford. It seems to me that under the facts as narrated by the Lieutenant-General of the Army and the Secretary of War in their reports, stronger and more urgent demand for indemnity should be made upon the Mexican government. But, if it is not to be so, if no redress is to be asked from Mexico, then I submit that something in the way of relief should be afforded to the family of this gallant soldier who met with such a horrible death.

He leaves a mother who, I understand, is insane, who was dependent upon him for her support and maintenance, and there survives him a brother entirely unfitted by reason of physical disability (contracted, I believe, during the war of the rebellion as a soldier) who was also dependent upon him.

The reason of my interest in this matter, aside from that which I feel as a citizen anxious that fair indemnity should be given to those who suffer in the public service and for the public good, and desirous that there should be some sort of explanation or apology for that which is in the nature of an insult to the flag of the country, is because I number these people among my constituents.

I hope, Mr. President, that the bill which I introduce, passing as it will to the Committee on Foreign Relations, will receive very speedy and very thorough investigation.

The bill (S. 3086) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of the late Captain Emmet Crawford, United States Army, killed in Mexico by Mexican troops, January 11, 1886, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10395) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

INDEBTEDNESS OF PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no concurrent or other resolutions the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution which comes over from yesterday under objection.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. MCPHERSON was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, as soon as practicable, the sums of money which were owing to the United States by the bond-subsidized Pacific railroad companies, respectively, on the 1st day of January, 1887, giving detail of all payments made on account of the same, and also the sums which are due and to become due, principal and interest, under existing law, severally and collectively, from said companies, and what difference will result to the Treasury if Senate bill No. 1200 should become a law.

Mr. HOAR. That resolution was taken up by unanimous consent yesterday. It comes over as unfinished business, I believe. No objection was made to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Massachusetts to object.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir; I said that it wanted one minute of 2 o'clock, and I did not wish to take the floor for one minute only. The Chair did not hear me, possibly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The RECORD shows that to have been the fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Massachusetts as objecting.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But still the Chair would hold the objection as coming too late.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I think I distinctly asked the Chair if an objection was made to its consideration. If the Chair rules that it is not in order to come up as unfinished business I move that the resolution be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no concurrent or other resolutions the Chair will put the question on taking up the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to offer a resolution asking for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa offers for adoption a resolution, which will be read.

The resolution submitted by Mr. ALLISON was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate the report of the board of engineers recently made and other information in his Department respecting the question of bridging the Mississippi River at or near Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HOAR. If I may be permitted to make one statement I should be glad to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the question arises on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him yesterday.

Mr. HOAR. From whom did the objection come?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that objection was made to the resolution of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not understand any one to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey objected.

Mr. MCPHERSON. With a view to get on with the consideration of the other matter.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; we shall see how the Senator from New Jersey gets along.

Mr. HOAR. If I may be permitted to make a statement for one moment, I think I can relieve the whole matter. I desire to withdraw the amendment which I proposed yesterday and to consent to the passage of the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey without the amendment, because I am satisfied on examining it that all the amendment calls for will be accomplished by the resolution without amending it.

I desire to say in regard to the question put by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] that while I am now enabled to answer that question imperfectly, I prefer rather to defer the answer until the subject comes up again in some other way, when I shall have the complete statistical information in my possession.

So, with the leave of the Senate, I desire to withdraw my amendment and suggest that the resolution as originally offered be passed without any further discussion.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, I have a single word to say. I did not object to the resolution of the Senator from Iowa except upon the ground that it displaces my resolution, which is properly before the Senate. I only want to have it acted upon at once, and then I shall very gladly withdraw the objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say that I have now obtained a Department copy of the report of the Commissioner of Railroads, General Johnston, which completely and fully and in detail answers every question there is in this resolution, except requesting—which is the right thing to do, and that is the form of the resolution, if you are going to ask anybody's opinion, which we have no right to ask—except requesting the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury as to how the thing will stand if a certain bill is to be taken as the basis of our action. It is a mere matter of opinion, and so it comes to a question of this resolution being merely a request to the Secretary of the Treasury to advise us on a subject of arithmetic. If the Senator from New Jersey wants to do it, I certainly have no objection.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator from New Jersey does not want to do that. He wants to direct the Secretary of the Treasury, and if the resolution is not in those words I desire to have it so amended.

BRIDGE AT SAINT LOUIS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is the request of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that the Senate proceed to the present consideration of the resolution submitted by him, which will be again read, the objection having been withdrawn.

The resolution submitted by Mr. ALLISON was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not exactly understand that I have withdrawn my objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Iowa. I stated that the Chair having ruled, as I understood, that the resolution which I had the honor to offer yesterday is now before the Senate, I was not willing to have any matter come in and supersede it or displace it from consideration; and that I should withdraw any objection to the Senator's resolution after this was considered. The Senator from Massachusetts now having withdrawn his amendment, I can see no reason whatever why the resolution which I offered shall not be considered.

Mr. HOAR (to Mr. ALLISON). Let it pass. There will not be any objection to it.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not care.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the resolution of the Senator from Iowa has precedence, and the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey will, as a matter of course, come next.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It certainly has precedence under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. VEST. I do not object, but should be glad to make an observation in regard to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear it, if there be no objection.

Mr. VEST. At the last session of Congress I introduced a bill for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Saint Louis. The bill was regularly referred to the Committee on Commerce of the Senate. It was considered before that committee and argument heard pro and con, the Senator from Iowa himself appearing in opposition to the bill, and the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN], also opposing the bill.

After this discussion and examination the bill passed the committee, and I was authorized to report it favorably to the Senate, which I did. It was placed upon the Calendar and has been there for several months.

While the bill was pending in the House of Representatives and in the Senate and before the committees of the respective bodies the Bureau of Engineers made a report favorable to the construction of the bridge. To my surprise, at the close of the session of the Senate, just before the recess, in a running discussion between the Senator from Iowa and myself, when I attempted to have the bill taken from the Calendar and considered, he made the statement that a board of engineers or a commission of engineers had been sent by the Bureau of Engineers out to Saint Louis for the purpose of examining and reporting upon the matter.

During my eight years' service in this body I have never heard of such a proceeding before. It was an ex parte order, made by the Secretary of War, without notice to the friends of this measure. The result has been that the people of Saint Louis, who are now attempting to build a free bridge there in opposition to the monopoly of Mr. Jay Gould, had only two days' notice in which to produce any evidence before that board of engineers.

It is now no longer a secret that that board, upon this ex parte testimony taken by the opponents of the measure, have made a report against this bridge bill. It was an unfair parliamentary proceeding, I care not from what source it emanated.

I called upon the Chief of the Bureau of Engineers and asked him how this order had been made. He first said that it was made upon the application of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate. I told him I was a member of that committee and knew that no such order had been made. He then said that certain Senators had called upon him and asked him to make the order for this board; that he informed them he had no such authority, and he next received directions from the Secretary of War to make a detail of engineer officers to proceed to Saint Louis. I then called upon the Secretary of War to know how this ex parte proceeding had been carried on without notice to my colleague, to myself, to the Board of Exchange of Saint Louis, or to any citizens of that city. Mr. Endicott informed me that he had made it pro forma; that he did not know there was any contest about the bill at all; that he did not know it was reported from the Committee on Commerce; that he did not know it was pending in the Senate; and that he simply made the order in obedience to the personal request of the Senator from Iowa, the Senator from Minnesota, and the Senator from Wisconsin.

The result has been what I have already stated, that upon two days' notice the people of Saint Louis were rushed into this examination, and this is the report for which the Senator from Iowa now asks. That is all I want to say about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say just one word in response to the remarks made by the Senator from Missouri.

This bill, it is true, has been pending here for some time. I think it was reported last summer from the Committee on Commerce. The report was made, as I understand the facts to be, without any examination by the board of engineers or any member of that board, which was an unusual proceeding.

There is no contest respecting the construction of another bridge at Saint Louis. The contest is as to the character of that construction with reference to its effect upon the navigation of the Mississippi River, all the people above the mouth of the Missouri claiming that the proposed construction would have the effect to materially interfere with the navigation of the river. So petitions came from every part of the Northwest, from Minnesota, from Wisconsin, from the State in which I live, and from Illinois, asking that a board of engineers be sent to Saint Louis for the purpose of making examination with reference to the proposed construction. These petitions were carried to the Chief of Engineers by Senators, and were then transmitted to the Secretary of War, making the request that a board of engineers should be sent to make this examination.

That was a perfectly proper and rightful request, as no examination had hitherto been made. I did not consult the Senator from Missouri, as I believe the other Senators interested did not, although there was no design or intention in any way to interfere with the completest publicity with reference to this matter.

The board was appointed by the Secretary of War. I understand they went to Saint Louis and made a thorough and exhaustive examination of this subject, not with reference to the construction of another bridge, because no one objects to the construction of another bridge; it is to the proposed method of construction which has been recommended here by the Committee on Commerce without a suggestion from any engineer who has ever examined this subject until now.

What I desire, is that this report, whatever it is—I have not seen it and I do not know its contents—may be brought into the Senate for the information of the Senate if it is of any value. I do not even know who the members of the board were. I take it for granted they were men eminent in the profession of engineering. That is all I have to say.

Mr. VEST. I am not objecting to that report coming here because I am very well aware that if I wanted to suppress it—which is not the fact—the Senator from Iowa could obtain a copy of it and read it here as a portion of his remarks before the Senate. I want to answer, though, one allegation of the Senator from Iowa, and that is that no engineer officer ever made any suggestion or recommendation in regard to this bridge before the action of the Committee on Commerce. If that be true, then the Bureau of Engineers was guilty of culpable and almost criminal neglect of duty, because we had before that committee the recommendation of the board of engineers in favor of this bill.

The Senator says now there was no examination. Then he seems to enjoy the confidence of that bureau, as I do not; but I say that the official recommendation of this bill was before the committees both of the House of Representatives and of the Senate when they acted on it.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator is it not a fact that no examination was made by the local engineer at Saint Louis or by a local board of engineers with respect to the location and construction of this bridge?

Mr. VEST. Why, Mr. President, no examination could have been necessary. Every foot of the territory, any portion of which could have been selected as a site for this bridge, was as familiar to all these engineers as the floor of this Senate is to me now; and so far from the Bureau of Engineers not having passed upon it, the local engineer opposed it; Mr. Corthell, another engineer, advocated it; and the question between the engineers was in regard to the difference between a high bridge and a low bridge across the Mississippi River.

Now, the Senator says that an exhausted examination was had by this board of engineers. I deny it. I do not propose to discuss the merits of the thing now, but I deny any such statement. They went there when the river was covered with ice. They did not examine the site of the bridge at all; they did not go outside of the city of Saint Louis. The mayor of the city requested them to take, at the expense of the city, carriages, or a steamboat if it could make its way through the ice, to the mouth of the Missouri River and examine the banks at the proposed site of the bridge, and they declined to do so.

This whole thing is ex parte from beginning to end. The point that I made—and the Senator does not deny it—is that this order for a board of engineers to examine a question which has created more feeling than any other local question that has come before this Congress was made without any notice to the friends of this bill, without my colleague or myself ever hearing of it, and without consulting the boards of exchange or the citizens of Saint Louis. That is all I want to say about it.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I desire simply to say that I hope the resolution of the Senator from Iowa will pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This debate is only by unanimous consent.

Mr. CULLOM. As my constituents have some interest in the subject, I think it proper that I should say a word. I am in favor of a bridge at the point where it is proposed to build one according to the bill of the Senator from Missouri. At the time when the bill was first reported I was inclined to think I was in favor of the bill as reported; but I find on examination that a very great number of the people of Illinois, up and down the Mississippi and the Illinois Rivers, and in the northern part of the State are exceedingly anxious that the report of the engineers spoken of here should be had before Congress takes action on the bill. I desire, so far as I am concerned, and so far as my people are concerned, to see another bridge built at the point indicated; but I think it is a very important matter, before the character of the bridge is determined upon, that we have all the information we can get on the subject. I hope the resolution will pass so that we may get the report of the board of engineers that is called for by it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate the report of the Board of Engineers recently made and other information in his Department respecting the question of bridging the Mississippi River at or near Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri.

INDEBTEDNESS OF PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANIES.

Mr. McPHERSON. I now call up the resolution I offered yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution which comes over from yesterday is pending before the Senate. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] withdraws his amendment. The resolution will be again read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not necessary to read the resolution again. It has been read half a dozen times.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to change the word "requested" to "directed."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think we ought to do that in regard to one part of the resolution. We are asking the Secretary to do a thing which he is not bound by law to do for us; that is, to give his opinion. I noticed the phrase in the resolution, and supposed perhaps it was adapted to that very fact. The Secretary might very rightfully reply to us, if we attempt to direct him to give his view upon certain subjects, that we have gone entirely beyond our province. The matter has been stated here so many times that I hope the Senator from New Jersey will consent to leave his resolution exactly as it is. It is a request that the Secretary will give us his ideas on a certain subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as offered.

The resolution was agreed to.

MARY A. LOGAN.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed at this time to the consideration of the bill I reported yesterday for the benefit of Mrs. Logan, widow of the late General LOGAN. It will take but a moment. Many Senators desire that it should be disposed of.

The President pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3050) giving a pension to Mary A. Logan.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania. I desire simply to say that if this bill is passed it will do for Mrs. Logan precisely what we have done for the widow of General Hancock and for the widow of General Thomas. It is true that General LOGAN was a volunteer officer. His military record is so well known that it seemed unnecessary for us to go into that in committee. We base this report upon the well-known historical facts of his eminent services as a general, of the sufferings that he underwent in the cause of his country, wounded five times in all, and of the disease under which he suffered during that service from which we are satisfied he died.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] has a brief record of his military services, which I understand he intends to present to the Senate. It appears to me that it is not necessary to detain the body any longer in relation to this matter.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to understand some points in connection with this bill that have not been disclosed by the chairman of the committee.

No man has a higher regard for the personal character or the military services of General LOGAN than myself, but the theory upon which pensions have been granted is that they are on account of disease contracted or injuries received in the service. There is nothing disclosed here as yet by the report of the chairman of the committee showing that the death of General LOGAN resulted from disease contracted or wounds received in the service. That is a point which ought to be explained if the bill is on the theory heretofore practiced.

The Senator states that this bill places Mrs. Logan on the same ground as to granting pension as the widow of General Hancock and the widow of General Thomas. There is, to my mind, a wide difference between these cases. General Hancock passed his whole life in the military service of the country. A man who has spent his life in the service of his country, in the military service especially, where it would be impossible for him to engage in any business whereby to accumulate money for his family, should have his family provided for after his death. Equally is that true of General Thomas, who passed his whole life in the military service, both these gentlemen being distinguished soldiers and men who were within a short period of retirement at the time of their death. I do not now remember the age of General Thomas when he died; but he must have been sixty years old, and General Hancock was over that age when he died.

General LOGAN was a citizen, to be placed, so far as pensions are concerned, on the same principles as any other citizen, it seems to me. That is to say, if he contracted disease in the military service from which he died, or if his death was occasioned by reason of wounds received in that service, it would be sufficient ground for a pension to the widow. Whether the committee are satisfied of that proposition I do not know, because it has not been disclosed here. We have simply a naked bill without any explanation whatever which shows the facts of the case. I would prefer to have some further explanation than we have had up to the present time before we pass the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania. In view of what the Senator from Texas has said, and in view of the report made on every occasion of a proposed pension, unless there be specially exceptional and historical circumstances as in this case, I think it is not inappropriate that I refer to a case which I think is a precedent and one of historical importance also—that of the widow of the late General Francis P. Blair.

A bill was introduced in the Forty-fourth Congress for pensioning the widow of General Blair, and I find that there was no report in either House upon the case. Evidently it was passed upon the general knowledge and information of the two Houses of Congress in relation to that case. Subsequently, in 1884, a supplement was passed. I find a report in that instance, but there is nothing in that report on the question of disability or requiring any proof upon it. More was done in that case than to increase the pension of Mrs. Blair to $50 a month. Five thousand dollars in gross sum was granted her by the special act of 1884.

It seems proper in this case that we should not put the parties to the delicate endeavor of securing expert testimony at this time upon that question. I took a little pains, however, to do that in a proper way by inquiring of the surgeon who attended General Logan in his last sickness and who has been the family physician for fifteen years past, but he himself is now sick and unable to make a formal statement.

I have myself in conversation with General LOGAN heard him state that he was five times wounded in the late war, that he was undoubtedly entitled to a pension, but that he had never thought it proper to ask for one. I have often been reminded when I have seen him walk into this Chamber of the beautiful sentence which Charles Lamb quoted from one of the ancient dramatists, "It is a brave sight to see a veteran scarred." But in addition to this, I remember also in that conversation that he said he had suffered from rheumatism, from the effects of which, as we all understand, as a matter of public notoriety, he unquestionably died, caused by wounds received while he was in the military service.

I believe the statement which will be presented by the Senator from Illinois will bear out these facts. I think, therefore, that we make no dangerous precedent but only follow the line of others which have been already made and are consistent with the general rule that public bodies like this may well take notice of historical characters and of their lives, to this extent at least, that we may base this legislation on the proposition that the pension is granted to the widow of a man who died from the effects of disease contracted in the service during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, the statement that I have had placed on my table in reference to General LOGAN'S military career is a statement taken from the military record of General LOGAN. I do not think it is important that I should read it to the Senate, as there are three or four pages of memoranda simply giving the dates of the battles in which he was engaged from day to day during the period of his service. In it are also references to the battles in which he received wounds.

I may state the fact that he has told me no less than four or five times, the last one on the evening of the day he was taken sick in that sickness which resulted in his death, that his old rheumatic trouble had come upon him again, which he contracted at the battle of Fort Donelson, where he lay in the snow and sleet over night and fought during the day until the victory was won by the Union army. There is no question of the fact that he died from rheumatism contracted while he was in the service of his country.

I do not think it necessary that this memorandum should be read to the Senate, but for the sake of the record, if it is desired, I will have it inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, showing his military history and showing the fact that he was wounded at five different times, wounded, twice in the battle to which I have specifically referred, and that he had rheumatism contracted at that time or immediately afterward.

I was with him two or three times before the last period when he was suffering from rheumatism, and he frequently referred to the fact that when a snow-storm came upon the country it affected him with the old rheumatic trouble that he had contracted when he lay in the snow on the field of battle.

I do not think it necessary for me to trespass longer on the Senate, but I hope the bill will pass, as there is no question about the fact of his receiving his disability in the service as a volunteer soldier. I hope there will be no further objection to the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the memorandum will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears none.

The memorandum is as follows:

SERVICE OF JOHN A. LOGAN.

Second lieutenant, Company H, First Illinois Volunteers, Mexican war.

Mr. SEWELL. I desire to bear my testimony in this case. I am sorry the question has been raised as to the disability having occurred within the line of duty of the late Senator LOGAN. I have day after day, time and again, in this Chamber and in the corridors, listened to him describing his sufferings, and dating them to different fields during the war. It was so patent to everybody connected with the Pensions Committee that his death was from that cause that it was not deemed necessary to inquire any further into the matter. We simply made up our minds on our own knowledge of the facts of the case.

That his family should be taken care of by the nation there is no doubt and no question in our minds. There is no man living, and there is no man who has died since the war, with probably one, or perhaps two exceptions, who rendered such distinguished service to the country as our late companion on this floor. Brave and gallant gentleman as he was, there should not be a doubt or question as to giving this sum to his widow.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the bill which I ask may be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And that Apolline A. Blair, widow of the late Francis P. Blair, jr., a major-general of the United States volunteers in the late war for the Union, shall also be paid from the passage of this act for and during her natural life a pension of $2,000 per annum, in lieu of the pension of $50 per month now paid to her.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I do not suppose that any Senator present who has any feeling of sympathy in him whatever has any doubt of the propriety of the proposed legislation, and I do not offer this amendment in order to antagonize the pending bill. I was a personal friend of General LOGAN, and I am very glad to say that no difference of political opinion ever came between us in our social relations.

When the bill giving a pension to the widow of General Hancock was before the Senate, I considered the propriety of this amendment, but for the reasons which have been well expressed to-day by the Senator from Texas I concluded to waive the amendment at that time.

The widows of twenty-two officers in the Army and Navy of the United States now receive $50 a month as a pension from the Government. Among this number is the widow of General Francis P. Blair. The friends of General Blair in Missouri know very well that his constitution was utterly wrecked by his military services in the war. To a great extent there is a striking analogy between the careers of General LOGAN and General Blair. Both were Western men, both were volunteer soldiers, and both impressed themselves distinctly and extensively upon the results of the war in our section of the country.

I am not here to draw any comparison between these two great soldiers, but I am here as one who opposed them both during that struggle, to say that within my personal knowledge no man did more for the Union cause, and I make no exception, than Francis P. Blair. Born in a slave State, a slaveholder by inheritance, it is within my personal knowledge that he was the first Free-soiler within the State of Missouri. At the risk of his life, unaided and alone, he upheld the Union cause from beginning to end. They were both Senators of the United States, they were both candidates for the Vice-Presidency, and both were defeated.

Mrs. Blair was left penniless. Frank Blair like JOHN LOGAN served his country for more than twenty-five years and left no private fortune to his family after him. Mrs. Blair receives to-day $50 a month as a pension. Her husband was a major-general of volunteers. If the widow of any man is to be paid out of the public Treasury in proportion to public services rendered to the Union cause, Mrs. Apolline A. Blair is most assuredly that woman.

I do not offer this amendment to oppose the pending bill, but I say now and here that it would be eminently proper that the families of both these great volunteer officers, without any suspicion of any partisan inducement to action, should be alike provided for by the bounty of the nation.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish the Senator from Missouri would waive his amendment to this bill. I assent to every word he has said in acknowledgment of the great merits of General Blair. I will say as much and more. No man could feel more kindly toward his widow or the proposition to do whatever may be just or more than just if possible, generous. Her case has been passed upon and a pension of $600 a year awarded. If it be thought that more ought to be done, let that matter be referred also to the Pensions Committee, and let the committee report on the subject.

Mr. CULLOM. Allow me to make a suggestion. As a matter of fact the Congress of the United States voted in the first place the sum of $5,000 to the widow of General Blair in full compensation for money and time expended by General Blair in raising men, organizing troops, &c.; and also a pension to the widow of $50 a month. I mention those provisions in the act as a matter of information.

Mr. HAWLEY. Whatever may have been done in that case, if it be thought by her friends or by the Senate generally that more ought to be done I hope it will be; but I prefer that the measure should be referred to the Pensions Committee and properly reported and stand upon its own merits.

I beg leave to say that to those of us who entertained for General LOGAN, as many or as most did who were near him, and as all did who really knew the man, profound affection as well as respect, it will take away something of the grace of this act of justice and generosity to couple it with another. I would rather each stood precisely on its own merits. I would like to do this thing for the memory of General LOGAN, for the good of his family, and not couple it with anything else, I do not care how meritorious it is. I wish the Senator from Missouri would make an independent proposition of his suggestions.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope I may be allowed to say one word.

It was my good fortune to know General Blair probably as intimately as almost any man as near him as I was, and I appreciate every word that the Senator from Missouri has said in behalf of his record as a soldier and as a man, and I am prepared to vote whatever the judgment of the Senators representing his State may think is proper under the circumstances. But the case of the widow of General Blair has been passed upon heretofore by an act giving her $5,000 in one sum and then providing for a pension, and if anything further is necessary to be done I shall be very glad indeed to join the Senator from Missouri in doing it; but I would be exceedingly grateful to him if in this case he would not insist upon the amendment as an attachment to the bill giving to the widow of General LOGAN a pension that I believe the Senate are pretty much all agreed she ought to have. I will join the Senator from Missouri with the greatest pleasure in doing for the widow of General Blair whatever he thinks ought to be done; but I trust that this bill will be allowed to stand upon its own merits separate from any other. As the Senator from Connecticut has said, it would seem to be an effort to make an omnibus arrangement and take away somewhat from the expression of gratitude that the passage of this bill would convey if it was passed by itself.

Mr. HOAR. And take away from both.

Mr. CULLOM. It would take away from both, as the Senator from Massachusetts suggests. I hope the Senator from Missouri will withdraw his amendment, and then let us take up the other case and do exactly what is right by it.

Mr. VEST. My own desire was to place the widow of General Blair on the same footing with the widow of another general officer of the Union Army of the same rank. I was perfectly sincere and frank in my statement that I was not opposed to the pending bill, and do not offer the amendment for that purpose. After what has been said by Senators, and as I see what the vote will be, I withdraw this amendment with the view of to-morrow, or perharps earlier, offering a bill giving a pension of $2,000 a year to Mrs. Blair.

It has been suggested to me that $50 a month was all that Mrs. Blair asked for. She asked for nothing. Frank Blair never asked for a dollar from the Government, although he spent three times the amount of $5,000 in raising troops for the Union Army before the Government had appropriated a dollar. Mrs. Blair asked nothing; but her friends in the House of Representatives, who originated the bill of 1884—the first bill not fixing the pension satisfactorily—of their own motion, without consulting her, placed the pension at $50 a month. She took it without a word and has never asked more. I am acting now on my own responsibility, without consultation with her or her family. On to-morrow I shall introduce the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, if this bill passes without objection, and without the call of the yeas and nays, each Senator present is committed to the support of its provisions. I have no hope that anything which I can say will prevent the passage of the bill, but I am not in favor of its passage.

If Mrs. Logan be allowed $2,000 a year there can be no reason why the widow of each major-general who served in the late war should not also be allowed $2,000 a year; and if the widows of major-generals, why not of the brigadiers, of the colonels, of the majors, of the captains, of the privates? There is no difference that I can see in principle, and there ought to be no difference in practice.

A few years ago Mrs. Lincoln was allowed a pension as widow of a President. That was made a precedent, and to-day each widow of an ex-President receives a pension of $5,000 a year.

It is claimed that the bill for Mrs. Hancock makes a precedent for the granting of this pension, and so this will be a precedent for other cases. I believe that granting pensions indiscriminately and recklessly and for such large amounts is detrimental to the best interests of the country, and I am opposed to it.

I wish to say, however, that no prejudice against the character of General LOGAN, or want of appreciation of the services he rendered the country, induces this opposition. There was no man on the opposite side of the Chamber for whom I had a higher regard; no man whose services I appreciated more. I regarded him as an open and a manly man. He fought hard where he was attacked, but he never wantonly wounded the feelings of any one for the mere pleasure of giving pain. I admired him greatly; but I believe that General LOGAN while living would have been the last man to desire that his widow should be placed upon a footing superior to that of the widows of his comrades in arms. I therefore am opposed to the passage of the bill.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I shall take very great pleasure in voting for this bill for the relief of the widow of General LOGAN. I consider the bill justified by every principle of public policy. The country can not have the benefit of distinguished public service without furnishing some inducement for it. If those who sacrifice their lives or their property or devote themselves with distinction to the public service are to be punished instead of rewarded by having their relatives and those for whose welfare their dearest efforts are given left penniless and dependent, we are depriving the public service of one of the greatest inducements which could be offered to men to devote their lives and efforts to the country.

In addition to that, Mr. President, while it is impossible for us to reward with equal justice and liberality every private soldier and to pension the widow of every private and every officer with the largest sum awarded to distinguished merit, it is possible and right for us to reward the most distinguished military service by an adequate and larger provision for those they leave behind them; and certainly General LOGAN held the highest position as a devoted military servant of the republic.

Then, added to his military fame is his civil service. He was a Senator respected here for his private and his public integrity of character, for his excellent judgment, and his unyielding devotion to the public service. That certainly detracts nothing from the reward due to him for his military service, but in my judgment adds largely to the claim he leaves upon us, his colleagues, the witnesses of his labors, to recognize in some unusual manner his extraordinary services and his remarkable traits of character.

For one, therefore, I desire to express my earnest approval of this bill, and while I would rejoice at the opportunity of doing equal justice to the widow of the distinguished citizen of Missouri, General Blair, I am gratified that the Senator from Missouri has withdrawn that amendment and left the Senate to an act of grateful recognition of the distinguished service of our late colleague.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TREATY WITH CHINA AS TO OPIUM.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1899, being the bill (S. 3044) to carry into effect the treaty stipulations of the United States made in 1880 with the government of China, for the suppression of the opium traffic. It has been urged upon us repeatedly by the Presidents of the United States, and I am sure it will not take five minutes if it can only be understood; and it ought to be passed for the honor of our country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3044).

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 3044) to provide for the execution of the provisions of article 2 of the treaty concluded between the United States of America and the Emperor of China on the 17th day of November, 1880, and proclaimed by the President of the United States on the 5th day of October, 1881, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

APOLLINE A. BLAIR.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 3087) to increase the pension of Mrs. Apolline A. Blair; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VEST. I ask the Senate to consider the bill now, without a reference. It is a bill perfectly understood. There is no question about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed now to the consideration of the bill introduced by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3087) to increase the pension of Mrs. Apolline A. Blair.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Apolline A. Blair, widow of the late Francis P. Blair, jr., a major-general of United States volunteers in the late war for the Union, shall be paid from the passage of this act, for and during her natural life, a pension of $2,000 per annum, in lieu of the pension of $50 per month now paid to her.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT HAYS RESERVATION.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask consent at this time to make a favorable report from the Committee on Military Affairs on the bill (S. 3023) to authorize the Kansas, Texas and Southwestern Railway Company to build its road across the Fort Hays Military Reservation; and as this is a matter of entirely local importance but of pressing need I ask that it may be now considered.

There being no objection the bill (S. 3023) to authorize the Kansas, Texas and Southwestern Railway Company to build its road across the Fort Hays Military Reservation was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WIDOW OF FRANK M. SMITH.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the miscellaneous items contingent fund of the Senate, to Mrs. Helen M. Smith, widow of Frank M. Smith, deceased, late laborer in the employ of the Senate, the sum of $720, the said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

JAMES B. RUSSELL.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senate to consider at this time—it will only take a moment—Order of Business No. 1188, a bill for the relief of James B. Russell, a pension bill, which has been postponed from time to time at my instance. The man is one of my own constituents, and I desire that the bill may be now taken up that I may make an explanation in regard to it.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. 5692) for the relief of James B. Russell was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of James B. Russell, late first lieutenant of Company H, Second Regiment East Tennessee Cavalry.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to say that about the time this bill was first reached upon the Calendar—it was reported in May last—I had information from a gentleman who claimed that he was a Union soldier and a neighbor of this applicant stating that the claim was not a just one. In view of the charges made I thought it best to delay action until the matter could be investigated. So I applied to General Black, the Commissioner of Pensions, and asked him to send a trusted and reliable special examiner to the neighborhood to make a thorough and full investigation in regard to the merits of this case and the character and standing of this applicant, and to ascertain whether it was a just and meritorious or a fraudulent claim. I have just received from General Black a letter which I will read, omitting some names:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 5, 1887.

SIR: Referring to claim for pension, No. 164408, of James B. Russell, late first lieutenant, Company H, East Tennessee Cavalry, for whose relief a bill is now pending before the Senate of the United States, I have the honor to advise you that in compliance with your request of May 27 last an investigation has been had of the allegations made by one ——— ———, of Ozark, Mo., in a communication addressed to you and that the result thereof is as follows: The special examiner in the course of his investigation procured the testimony of six persons among, which is that of the said ——— ——— and two of his brothers.

All the testimony is favorable to the claimant, excepting that of ——— ——— whose standing does not seem to be good, and against whom, but for the statutes of limitations, criminal proceedings would have been instituted for forgery in connection with the claim for pension of Henry Burger, No. 141185.

This person who preferred the charge—

The testimony further shows that about a year ago a misunderstanding occurred between the claimant and the said ——— ——— with regard to the amount of compensation due the latter for notarial service in connection with said claim.

Very respectfully,

JOHN C. BLACK, Commissioner.

Hon. F. M. COCKRELL,
United States Senate.

Now I ask that the bill may be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 10395) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

STENOGRAPHER FOR COMMITTEE HEARINGS.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library, to whom were referred certain petitions in relation to procuring copies of historical documents in foreign archives, be authorized to employ a stenographer at the hearing on such petitions, to be paid for from the contingent fund of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 10394) making appropriations for the support and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 10397) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the interstate-commerce bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I regret that I consumed as much time as I did yesterday, and yet perhaps there is no reason why I should apologize in view of the fact that probably never in the history of governments was a bill under consideration which would inevitably affect, either directly or remotely, so great financial and industrial interests as this bill. It will reach every hamlet, every industry, every laboring man, and every laboring man's family in the United States with its results, either for evil or for good; and therefore I think that I need not apologize for the time which I have already taken and shall take in discussing it. I will endeavor, however, this morning to be brief.

I endeavored to show yesterday that contracts which are called pooling contracts were much misunderstood. I undertook to show that, though abuses may have attended the administration and performance of those contracts, there was nothing inherently wrong in them, nothing inherently injurious to the public welfare. I maintained, that, before the Senate and House of Representatives should stamp and brand them as criminal, somebody should show that they were inherently wrong, and that any evils or mistakes which had arisen in connection with their execution were merely incidental and not a necessary result of the system.

I undertook to show that they were recognized, sanctioned, and enforced by the decisions of English courts, and that it was at least an open question in this country whether they would not be sanctioned by our own courts upon full consideration. I undertook to show that they were not injurious to public policy, not injurious to the public interests, by combating the doctrine that every kind of competition in trade and business is for the public welfare and the public interest. I tried to say—not expressing it as well as I would like to have expressed it—that unnatural, illegal competition is always opposed to the public interests, and that if there is any such law as has found popular expression in the phrase "competition and the survival of the fittest," it is a law which encourages only that competition which results in the best and the permanence of the best. I claimed that these contracts in their nature and in their proper execution were not opposed to the competition which has for its object the encouragement of the best and the permanence of the best.

When I gave way to a motion to proceed to executive business I was speaking upon this proposition: That the business of the railroad carrier was unlike any other business so far as it was governed and influenced by the law of competition. I had shown that the railroad was not a free highway, not a highway upon which all the citizens of the United States are free to put their carriages and transport goods; that for that very reason the law of competition and the survivalship of the fittest was not applicable to it, for that involves the physical removal of the weakest, and you can not remove the railroad.

You may bankrupt the management of the road, but in other business when you bankrupt the management the capital is destroyed and other capital goes on relieved for the time from the pressure of competition; but when you destroy the business management of a railroad the capital is not destroyed. The capital is mainly invested in the road. There it remains. There comes to take the place of the bankrupt corporation another corporation which utilizes the capital already invested; and the result is, differing from results in any other kind of business (and the history and experience of railroad management in this country shows it), that the newcomer inflates the capital, and after bankruptcy there is more capital upon which dividends must be paid than there was before competition produced the bankruptcy; that railroad capital always grows with what it feeds upon. It is probably not out of place in this discussion to speak of this evil which results from the inflation of railroad capital.

I refer only to the acknowledged fact that when competition has destroyed one competitive railroad corporation another takes the place of the vanquished with a larger capital, to be in turn destroyed or to be in turn the master of the other competitor.

There is another sense in which interstate commerce is not like any other business so far as it is affected by the law of competition. The business is largely of a public nature. As I said yesterday, it is the discharge of a public duty which the railroad engages in, certainly in the building of its road. It follows as a matter of course that the railroad company, in so far as it is discharging that part of its duty which is public, must discharge it as the state would discharge it; that in that respect it is properly limited to the same laws of competition, the same laws of business, the same methods of regulation and of doing business to which the state would in justice be limited and to which it would in justice be subjected.

The railroad company assumes in this business a portion of the power and duty of the state. Now, suppose the United States was operating the railroads, as they are operated in Germany, and to some extent in other countries of Europe, will any Senator say that the United States should enter into the kind of competition which railroad companies are inevitably forced into when there are competing roads and competing traffic and no pooling? Will any Senator say that a state operating railroads should under any circumstances allow rates to be put down to a point where they are ruinously low or practically unremunerative?

I apprehend that the Senator who should claim that it was for the public welfare and the public advantage that a state operating a railroad should carry freight for less than cost or for a sum which barely paid cost, operating expenses, and fixed charges, would be told that while certain favored citizens who wanted to ship certain commodities over the state railroads might be benefited by such a policy, the remainder of the public was taxed for the benefit of the few. And that argument holds just as good when private corporations are managing the railroads as it would if they were managed by the state.

There seems to be a great misapprehension in some portion of the public mind as to the question of what are unreasonable rates. Some people never apply that term except when the rates are too high. They have no idea that the rates can be too low. I maintain that a rate for carrying freight which only pays operating expense and fixed charges is as much unreasonable as a rate which is too high, and which will pay too large a dividend upon railroad property. We are here to do justice by the railroads and by the people. We are, like judges, to hold the scales of justice with even hand, and not act from prejudice or act wantonly. An unremunerative rate is just as unreasonable and just as injurious, though in a different direction, as an unreasonably high rate.

The railroads of this country must see to it, if the public welfare is to be promoted, that remunerative returns are received from freights and passengers. I do not stop to say what remunerative rates are. I do not stop to speak of the great question which comes up when that is to be considered as to whether remunerative rates mean such rates as will pay dividends upon the inflated capital of the railroads of the country. That is out of this discussion. I mean to say that it is the duty of railroads discharging a public duty as well as a private duty to see to it that if possible the business which they do yields remunerative returns to the capital investment, and that you can not endanger the public prosperity or destroy the public welfare any quicker than to establish rates or to let rates be established by competition which will not give fair remuneration to the capital invested in railroad enterprises. The whole history of the country shows it. I have seen two railroad-rate wars which resulted in such demoralization of business in this country as produced what might have been called two years' continuous panic.

Unremunerative rates injure, first, the investors in railroad securities; next, railroad employés; next, corelated industries; and, lastly, all industries; and it is the last wave of the enlarging circle of disturbance that is most disastrously felt. The injury produced by unreasonably low rates is finally felt by every citizen. The toiler in remote hamlets feels the baneful effects of the general depression, but usually ascribes the result to every cause but the primary one, which is the railroad-rate war and the unreasonably low rates produced thereby. The interests of the people are so closely united that an injury to one branch of business is felt by all. Here, truly, an injury to one is the concern of all. How appropriate in this connection the language of inspiration: "We are many members, yet but one body; and the eye can not say unto the hand, I have no need of thee; or again the head to the feet, I have no need of thee."

I think people misapprehend the question in this respect. It is within the power of one railroad president to practically depress the entire business of the nation; and the West Shore Railroad and its management is a recent example and illustration of what I say. For this reason railroads are not subject to the same law of competition as other kinds of business are.

There is another reason, which is seldom alluded to. The competition, mark you, which it is claimed must not be prevented is the competition between competing railroads for competitive business. The proposition is that no matter what that competition is, no matter what the result of it is as to the lowering of rates or the discriminations which ensue, it must not be prevented, and therefore pooling must be prohibited. It is to that proposition that I desire to hold the discussion of this question.

The reason which I last alluded to is this: When rates are forced below the remunerative point, how does the railroad manager and the railroad president attempt to make money? Not from the legitimate business of the railroad, but by stock gambling. Unremunerative rates inevitably substitute stock gambling for the legitimate profit of business, substitute the effort to get money by stock gambling for the effort to earn it legitimately by railroad business. It is inevitable; it is in the nature of things.

It is not the remunerative railroad that furnishes the business for the stock exchange. It is not dealing in the remunerative railroad securities that produces panic, that makes millionaires and makes paupers in this country. The inducement to this business comes from the fact that by strife for competing business railroad managers are unable to make profit in a legitimate way. And so I say that the law of competition claimed, though it may be just as to other business, is inapplicable to the business of the management of railroads.

But, Mr. President, contracts such as I have described, arrangements such as this bill proposes to prohibit, can not essentially interfere with or prevent competition between railroads. That kind of competition, which it is supposed is prevented by such contracts, is the mere speck which floats upon the mighty current of competition always flowing. There are a thousand forces which compete in rivalry for the reduction of the rates of transportation, and you can no more stop those forces, no more stop the competition that goes on by the clash of rival commercial interests in this country and the world than you can sweep back the ocean with a broom.

The Mississippi River, the Welland Canal, great cities at different parts of the country forming commercial centers with different interests to be subserved, the ocean, the Canadian lines, the transit of the Isthmus, the ever-clashing interests of diversified business—all these are potent factors, continually, by their rivalry competing for the reduction of railroad freights. Cotton in the South, and in Egypt; wheat in Dakota and in India; petroleum in the United States and in Russia; coal in Pennsylvania; iron in Spain, all these things, and a thousand others, form an anti-monopoly league stronger than individuals or boards of trade, or commercial exchanges can form. They make it impossible that this purely competitive business can be done at excessive rates charged by common carriers. These contracts for division of business or apportionment of freight are but a trifle among the great forces which carry on the great war of competition which has so materially reduced the charges for the transportation of freight, and which will go on until the lowest limit possible with remunerative returns is reached.

If I had time I should like to stop here for a moment to speak of my belief that the limit has not yet been reached. The capacity of freight-cars has been increased from 10 tons to 20 tons; Bessemer steel rails have taken the place of iron rails; improvements in machinery, in locomotives—all these things have marvelously reduced the cost of transportation. Sometimes we feel that the end is reached, but I am told that freight-cars are now in process of construction which will carry 25 tons, or 50,000 pounds, in place of the original cars with a capacity of 20,000 pounds; that engines are being built whose ten driving wheels will wonderfully increase the power of locomotion, and that these improvements in engines and cars will necessitate the relaying of the iron rail, substituting a heavier rail, perhaps a 100-pound rail for 60-pound rails. The limit of the cheapening of the cost of transportation has not begun to be reached, and these little arrangements between railroad companies, adopted for their self-protection and for the protection of the public as well, have very little part to play in this great competition which is going on and must go on in relation to this business.

But there is another ground on which I ask the Senate to pause before it declares such arrangements between railroad companies to be criminal. I want them to consider a question which takes hold of the future of this country. These contracts and agreements and arrangements between railroad companies are in the nature of business combinations between different railroad corporations. Admit, if you please, that there is something bad about them, for the sake of argument; they must be tolerated, or the alternative is consolidation of railroad capital. I dread that result. Some political economists, some railroad men, and some men interested in what they think they see in the future, the grand co-operative commonwealth, believe that that is the best outcome of the railroad problem.

I wish to emphasize this point: George Stephenson said that where combination was possible, competition was impossible; and no man ever said a truer thing. This bill leaves open and invites the worst kind of combination which this country may fear; that is, the combination and consolidation of railroad corporate capital.

What are the railroads to do if forbidden from making these arrangements? Experience teaches that the old rate war will begin; the bill encourages it. It requires no notice from a railroad company to put down its rates, but notice in order to advance its rates. The whole bill is an invitation to the individual railroad company to put down its rates without public notice, and that means private notice in advance for the purpose of securing business. The war is to go on if it is not restrained by those arrangements which the railroad companies believe best for themselves in the interest of protection, and the result will be, as it always is, consolidation—capitalistic consolidation.

Why, Mr. President, the monopolies of this country are built on the graves of weak competitors, and this bill invites that grand monopoly of railroad capital in this country which will be built upon the graves of railroads that are not able to stand in the competition, which railroad monopoly will be the master of the people. I have not learned that such results are to be regarded with favor. I can not unlearn all the teachings of my youth at the demand of these economists, these professors of political economy, these railroad men, and these socialists. I believe that it is better to keep business in a good many hands, if you can, than to concentrate it in a few hands. I believe it is better to let the little stores in the country live than to build up the great mercantile establishments at their expense. I believe it is better to let the little factories live than to build up the great manufacturing corporations at their expense. I believe it is better to let the weak railroads live in this country than it is to build up one gigantic railroad corporation which shall occupy to the railroad business of the country the same position which the Western Union Telegraph Company occupies to the telegraph business of the country.

I believe we are holding up a false standard to our young men. I believe that the "little farm well tilled" is better than many leagues of land in one ownership tilled by capitalists whose laborers come and go, and who have little sympathy with the proprietors; that a "little house well filled" is better than the marble palace with its interior decorations of gold, its hangings of silk, and artistic carpets from the marts of foreign nations, better in their tendency to the advancement of the prosperity of the nation and the welfare of its people. But this bill presents these alternatives.

Senators may feel, perhaps, that I am overstating this matter. I want to turn them for a moment to history.

The railroads of this country have not had a long life. What has been the history with regard to consolidation—I mean a consolidation of capital, not combination by these business arrangements, which I defy any man to say are inherently wrong? I turn to Mr. Hadley's book, and I find that since 1853 the New York Central Railroad Company, then composed of fifteen or sixteen separate organizations, has consolidated and consolidated, until now it has a system including more than 4,000 miles of railroad line.

I find that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, originally composed of local roads, has under one system and one management 7,000 miles of railroad track. I find that what is called the Wabash system, originally composed of many small railroads, is now welded into one gigantic management of 9,500 miles. Where is this to stop? It is the dream and vision of the railroad man that it shall go on. That is the outcome of the problem for him. It is only a temporary check that he supposes is put upon it by these pooling arrangements.

Let me turn for a moment to the testimony of one railroad man on this subject. I read from Charles Francis Adams's testimony before the Interstate Commerce Committee on the subject of pooling, page 1204 of the report:

So far as pooling is concerned—a subject I see a good deal discussed—pooling, as I regard it, is a mere makeshift. It is an attempt on the part of the railroads to hold in check a natural law which would result in the survivalship of the fittest. If competition worked with its full severity and legislation put a stop to all pooling, saying absolutely to the railroads, "There you are, and you have got to compete"—and this I take to be the object of the proposed law—I do not suppose there would be at the end of two years more than three or four leading corporations in the country that would not be in the hands of receivers. It would be the condition of affairs now temporarily existing in New York between the Central and West Shore roads perpetuated and made chronic by force of law. Everlasting warfare among railroads would be provided for by statute. The thing is absurd and unworthy of discussion. Of course the railroads would in some way agree to divide traffic, and to divide traffic is to pool it. But supposing the pooling or division of the traffic effectually forbidden by law; then, so far as I can judge, the natural result would follow, a result which I for one do not object to at all, though it would be attended with immense waste of wealth and would wipe out of existence forms of securities which in amount probably would far exceed the national debt of the country.

The result would be that, as the companies became bankrupt, those who got possession of their properties would combine and consolidate them, and you would have one railroad corporation in the country in the course of a few years which, as compared with the corporations you now have, would occupy about the position the Western Union Telegraph Company occupies among telegraph companies; that is, one wholly predominating company. In other words, the legislation intended to prevent the pooling of traffic and insure competition would produce exactly what it was meant to prohibit. The railroads would be pooled themselves, and competition would be done away with through consolidation.

Then he goes on to say:

In order to secure so far as may be what you desire—that is, to preserve competition and prevent this consolidation into great corporations—the course that Congress should pursue would be the exact opposite of what is now suggested. Congress should legalize pooling, and impose a heavy penalty on any violation of pooling agreements. That would keep the weaker corporations alive and prevent their being absorbed by the large ones, as they inevitably soon must be the way things are now going on.

It will be observed that this bill does not in any line of it prohibit the consolidation of railroad capital, and in my judgment by prohibiting pooling and making it criminal it invites that result.

Now, I desire, Mr. President, to answer in advance, if I can, an argument which I know will surely be made in reply to what I say. It is that when the bill prohibits discrimination the necessity of pooling will be done away with. Suppose that to be so, for a moment. It is rather hard, even in that case, to say that a practice which has been resorted to with the avowed purpose, and only for the purpose, whatever its results may have been, of preventing discrimination, shall be declared criminal because the bill declares that discrimination must cease. I maintain that that is illogical.

But I do not believe that this bill unaided and alone will do away with discrimination, and I say so because it is the experience of foreign countries that rigid laws aimed against discrimination have been ineffectual except as aided by the efforts of the railroads themselves by pooling. The experience of foreign countries is worth something, and I want here to state what is said on that subject by Mr. Hadley. I do not know but that I read it yesterday, but I wish to emphasize what he says in these few words:

We are thus reduced to the simple alternative, pooling or discrimination. Each effort to prohibit both at the same time only makes the necessity more clear. The governments of continental Europe have ceased to struggle against it. Rightly judging that discrimination is the main evil, they recognize pools as the most effective method of combating it.

And yet for years and years they have had these anti-discrimination statutes which they can not enforce, and it was only by a resort to a system of pooling that they were able to enforce their laws. Is it not a strange thing, a solecism, that it should be urged here that an effort among railroad companies to secure the same thing which you say is to be accomplished by this bill should be declared criminal? Is it wise to discard any aid or agency which may help to carry out and make effective in its operation so important a bill as this and the removal of which may throw discredit upon the whole legislation and render it absolutely ineffectual?

I wish to read what the real situation with regard to pooling is in foreign countries.

Believing Professor Hadley, to whom I have so frequently referred in this discussion, to be the most thoroughly informed and thoroughly independent student of the railroad problem in the country, I wrote him asking for information as to the present status of pooling arrangements in Europe.

NEW HAVEN, December 25, 1886.

MY DEAR MR. PLATT: Please excuse the unavoidable delay in answering your letter.

The most conspicuous examples of the public use of pooling are found in Belgium, Germany, and Austria. Fifteen years ago all these countries had a good deal of active railroad competition; and it was found in each country that under any such active competition it was impossible to secure obedience to any law against discrimination. The reckless and speculatively managed roads were able to force not merely the sounder private roads but the state roads themselves into discriminations of the worst kind.

You know the general history, and I will only mention one or two recent facts:

I. The Belgian state railroads have within the last two years concluded a pooling agreement with the only private system of importance, which provides for an almost permanent division of traffic and is intended to render competition forever impossible.

II. Although nearly all the railroads in Germany are State owned, the rivalry between different systems is so strong that a pool is necessary to regulate the action of the officials themselves; and in order that the system may be thoroughly carried out, a recent imperial ordinance forbids the shipper to select the route over which his goods are to be sent.

III. In Austria not merely do the state roads divide traffic with the private roads, but also with competing water-routes; and the government authorities say explicitly that they regard this as the only possible method of securing justice to local points. There has been no recent change in legislation, but the practice is becoming more fully established every day.

These are the countries where the most positive authority is given to pools; they are also those where railroads are the best managed, rates on the whole lowest, and traffic developing most harmoniously. The other countries may be divided into two classes. In one class are France and Italy, where the country is districted between different railroads, and competition thus rendered impossible—a division of the field instead of a division of the traffic. Yet these countries pool their international traffic, which can not be thus districted.

The second class includes those countries where pooling is merely tolerated rather than encouraged—Switzerland, Russia, Holland, or England. It is noticeable, 1, that these countries suffer from more abuses and discriminations than those previously mentioned; 2, that they are worst where natural causes have hindered the growth of pools, as shown by a recent investigation in Holland; 3, that government authority over rates, however great, is ineffective to prevent discrimination, Russia being a strong instance in point.

As far as I know, no European country directly prohibits pools.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR T. HADLEY.

I do not think that we can afford to overlook the importance of the experience of these countries in this respect.

There is a single other feature of this bill to which I wish to refer in this connection. It contains a short-haul clause or law. Why? Why the necessity for it? The inexorable logic of the case is that the competitive rate is too low and the railroads are attempting to earn remunerative rates by putting unreasonable charges upon local traffic. Is there any other reason for a short-haul law? What is to be the effect of the prohibition of pooling? To make the competing rates still lower, they being now too low, and to force the railroad company, if it be possible, to raise its local rates.

How a man who insists upon the necessity and justice of a short-haul law can also insist upon the necessity and justice of a prohibition of pooling, I am unable to see. You propose to remedy the already too low competitive rates by saying that the railroads shall not recoup for their losses upon the local traffic, and yet you propose to prohibit that very thing which the railroad companies have adopted as the only means known to them to prevent competitive rates from going still lower. You put the railroad companies in the condition of a man under what was claimed to be the old Calvinistic theology, of which it was wittily rather than truly said that under its doctrine a man is "damned if he does, and damned if he don't." That is precisely what this bill proposes to do with the railroad companies of the country. In my judgment, a more glaring inconsistency in legislation was never attempted than in this proposal to insert a short-haul law and the prohibition of pooling in the same bill.

But there is another point to which I did not allude at length when I was speaking of the competition which exists, that it seems to me makes pooling necessary and makes its prevention entirely improper. The American railroads which are competing between the West and the East under this bill with pooling prohibited will be absolutely at the mercy of the Grand Trunk Railroad of Canada. Whatever effect a short-haul and long-haul clause may have upon that traffic as diverting it to Canada, you may rest certain, I think—and I think experience justifies me in the assertion—that if pooling is prohibited the traffic of the West comes to the seaboard through Canada and not over American roads. Why? Because by this bill you invite the Grand Trunk road to put down its rates without notice. It desires first of all things to insure business. Then it can put them up, probably.

It is to-day making its arrangements, by the outlay of great amounts of money in securing improved cars and engines and the improvement of its track, to do a greater through business. Now, prohibit pooling, put the bill in operation, and what will be the result? The Grand Trunk road may put all through business from the West to the seaboard down to an unremunerative point and make up for it by recouping upon the local traffic through Canada, and we are powerless to prevent it. You may say that pooling would not prevent it; but it is the only means which the American roads have to secure any terms with the Grand Trunk road which shall give them any considerable share of the traffic which shall pass from the West to the seaboard.

I have already occupied more time than I desired, and, instead of stating my own conclusion as to what pooling has accomplished, I prefer to state the conclusions of Mr. Nimmo, from whom I have frequently quoted during this argument and whom I quote with the more satisfaction because I think he has given the matter as careful study perhaps as any man investigating it outside of railroad circles. As will be seen by his reports, he devoted at least eight years to a scientific and practical study of this problem. The history of every pool, the results of every pooling arrangement almost, are to be found in the tables and statistics of his internal commerce reports from 1879 to 1884. The conclusions of such an investigator are entitled to weight, and as they are clearly and tersely stated and coincide entirely with my own, I wish to adopt them:

In conclusion, the following general observations may be made in regard to railroad federations or pooling organizations:

First. They have been instrumental in preventing unjust discriminations through special secret rates to favored shippers, and the consequent demoralization of trade.

Second. They have prevented many unjust and ruinous discriminations against towns and cities, and against particular States or sections of the country.

Third. They have put a stop to violently fluctuating rates.

Fourth. They have had the effect of protecting the weaker lines and of preventing their absorption by the stronger lines, and thus of conserving elements of competition in transportation.

Fifth. By preventing the absorption of the weaker by the stronger lines, they have prevented the threatened danger to the country of its being districted among a few great corporations, by which means the regulating influence of the competition of trade forces would have been eliminated, and transportation would have gotten the mastery of trade.

Sixth. They have tended to prevent those shocks to the financial interests of the country which generally accompany the bankruptcy of great railroad corporations.

Seventh. Since they have been adopted the railroad transportation facilities of the country have been greatly extended. The volume of traffic has also enormously increased, and rates have constantly fallen. These facts seem to prove that railroad federation has not had the effect of obstructing the beneficial operation of the competition of trade forces and of the direct competition between transportation lines. Statistics hereinbefore presented clearly indicate this fact.

Eighth. The most hopeful aspect of federations for the division or pooling of traffic is that thereby the railroads have been brought to a condition in which their accountability to the public interests may be more clearly defined, and in which any departure from undoubted principles of right can be observed and the responsibility therefor located. It is believed to be much easier to regulate great federations of railroads with respect to matters relating to commerce among the States than to regulate a great number of railroads acting independently, for the reason that these federations constitute concrete expressions of relationships and antagonisms both among railroads and among trade centers, and tend to illustrate the relative force of the same.

Ninth. Railroad pools have not proved to be rigid compacts, but they have been constantly subject to change. Occasional and even protracted wars of rates render their requirements at times almost entirely inoperative. This must, in the light of public interests, be regarded as a favorable symptom of their practical workings. The conditions surrounding and governing the commercial and transportation interests of the country are constantly subject to change, and it is impracticable that any fixed rules or set of rules should be formulated which in practice would tend to prevent such changes.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asks me if I have in my mind statistics bearing on the point as to whether the net receipts of the railroad companies pay more on the average than a fair rate upon the capital invested. I think that was the question. I have not the exact figures. I sent home to Connecticut, my own State; I found this to be true of Connecticut, that the amount paid as dividends upon railroad stock in the State of Connecticut during the past year would average upon the whole capital stock of Connecticut railroads about 4½ per cent. Of course some roads do not pay any, and one pays as high as 10 per cent., but the average upon the capital stock of all railroads in the State would be 4½ per cent. The statistics for the whole country are not accurately in my mind at this time, but I think I will venture upon my recollection to say that the entire railroad dividends of the United States in the year 1885 applied to the entire capital stock of the railroad companies of the United States would produce a dividend of about 2½ per cent.

Mr. HOAR. Do you mean stock unwatered?

Mr. PLATT. I mean the stock as it stands, watered, if it has been watered, and undoubtedly it has been. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] says that is true in all cases. I think it is not universally true. Here is a railroad running into Washington—the Baltimore and Ohio—that has not increased its capital stock in many years, which has to-day, as I remember, only twenty millions of capital stock, though its property equals in value the property of roads whose capital is three or four times as much. It is not true in a good many instances that might be mentioned. It is lamentable that it is too true in this country; but, as I said, the discussion of what rate of interest shall be paid upon the capital as it stands, including water, is outside of this discussion which I am now carrying on. I should say as severe things on that subject, probably, as any member of the Senate. I should be glad if there were some way to eliminate fictitious capital. I might regard competition as a blessing if when it bankrupted a railroad management the water should be eliminated before another management was set on foot; but that never will be.

Mr. President, I have heard it suggested in reply to all this that we can pass this law and then pass another law directing the commission to investigate; and if the commission shall, on the whole, conclude on its investigations that pooling arrangements are not injurious to the public welfare, then we can repeal the section prohibiting pooling. That is after the fashion of what is known in Scotland as Jedburgh justice, for border marauders, "hang them first, try them afterwards." That is not a correct principle in legislation. We had better investigate first. All investigation so far, the weight of all testimony, the weight of all the testimony of students who have given the most attention to this problem, and the weight of the best informed railroad officers and railroad commissioners, shows the wisdom of legalizing and regulating, rather than prohibiting, pooling.

I suppose that Senators will rise and tell me of specific instances where justice has not been done to localities or to individuals under pools. I reply, first, legalize them and then regulate them by this commission and the evils will disappear. They are not inherent in the system. I reply, second, those evils would not be remedied by prohibitions of pooling. They would exist still and be intensified. Do not charge upon the pool that for which it is not responsible. Do not make it criminal to engage in such contracts because certain things occur, not chargeable to them, which you do not like.

The issue here, however, is not between legalizing immediately and prohibiting. It is between the proposition now before the Senate and the Senate bill, which, very properly in my judgment, sought to refer this matter for further investigation to the commission to be appointed under the bill. I submit to the Senate that a majority of its Senators to-day believe that it is the wise thing to do; that the intelligent judgment of Senators must bring them to this conclusion. If it is wise, why surrender it? Shall we surrender it for the fear that if we do the wise thing here there may be obstinacy elsewhere which shall prevent any legislation at all? If that principle is to be adopted, then we are driven to this in the Senate, that whenever legislation upon any subject is desirable and we have determined what legislation is wise and politic and just, we are to surrender our views as to that and agree to legislation which we deem impolitic, unwise, and unjust, because otherwise we cannot get any legislation at all.

Mr. President, others may yield their judgment upon what they consider vital matters for the purpose of getting some kind of legislation, but for one I am content to stand and take the judgment of the country upon my action when I vote only for what upon mature deliberation I believe is the best legislation. I do not believe that the legislation will fail if this bill goes back to a conference with an indication that the Senate will not consent to brand as criminal practices those arrangements which railroads have made to accomplish the precise object which is intended to be accomplished by legislation in this bill. I believe we may trust to the good judgment of conferees and of legislators not to do a thing which, upon reflection and investigation, they must be satisfied will probably, I may say almost inevitably, break up and demoralize the existing conditions of railroad service in this country.

Nine-tenths of all the interstate-commerce business done to-day is done under those arrangements which are sought to be damned because of the evil meaning which has been given to the word "pooling."

Whatever of stability has been given to the railroad business, and through it to other business of the country, has been secured by these traffic arrangements, and in my judgment a bill which breaks them all up ruthlessly within sixty days, which invites the competition which is to demoralize business, will be far-reaching in its injurious results. For one, I prefer to stand by my judgment. I will try to have the courage of my convictions. I will try to do what I believe to be right, and I can not assent to a bill which, though I accept its other provisions, contains a provision which I regard as positively vicious and wrong.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it is very late in this debate, after it has occupied the attention of both Houses now for several years, for any one to attempt to advance an argument that has not already been sifted and winnowed thoroughly, and I shall not attempt to convince the Senate of anything to-day by arguing this question before them, but shall merely state the reasons which influence my own vote against this bill.

I am not content with the bill in respect of its practical effects upon the people of my own State, for Alabama is at the farther southern margin of the United States, and the markets in which we buy our dry goods and a large portion of our groceries are in the far northeast, and there is a broad intervening area of country between them. The markets in which we buy our supplies are also far distant from Alabama; they are in Chicago, Saint Louis, and Cincinnati chiefly. The markets in which we sell our products are all distant from our homes, and we have a vast tract of country to cross with transportation in getting over to the market of purchase or the market of sale.

So I think that any bill which forces the railroads of this country to raise the price of charges of freights for long hauls is necessarily inimical to the best interests of all the different business occupations in my State. That practical statement of the reasons why I might oppose this bill will be quite sufficient I think to justify me in the course that I feel compelled to take toward it, but I have other reasons which I will proceed to state as briefly as I may.

I deprecate the task which the decisions of the Supreme Court seem to have imposed upon Congress, of taking control of all internal commerce under the guise of regulating interstate commerce.

Had that court left to the States the field of jurisdiction, clearly open to them (in the absence of legislation by Congress), they would have dealt with the great lines of transportation in a way to benefit every community, and that, of course, would have benefited the whole country.

Every State can be trusted to take care of its own people, and their concurrent endeavors to restrain common carriers within due bounds would have been far more effectual than anything Congress can do, looking to this result. But the Supreme Court is about to force Congress into reluctant action, by having declared that the States can not regulate, within their own limits, the transportation of commerce destined to reach other States or countries. Congress has long resisted this demand upon its alleged powers and duties, by silence and inaction, until now it is declared by the Supreme Court that the States can not constitutionally exert any of these powers, because they are expressly conferred upon Congress.

They hold that all commerce becomes interstate that is destined to cross a State line, though it might traverse hundreds of miles within the State of its origin and only a few feet in the State where it is delivered.

For example, a car-load of merchandise shipped at Alexandria, Va., for Bristol, would be interstate commerce if it is delivered on the south side of a street in Bristol through which the line between Virginia and Tennessee runs. It would be Virginia commerce if delivered on the north side of that street.

A question of disputed jurisdiction between two governments, in which the most important questions are involved, would be made in such a case to hang upon the accident whether the delivery of the freight is made in Virginia or Tennessee. Or if the point of shipment and destination of the goods are to determine this question of jurisdiction, the matter would be quite as uncertain, for the shipper has the right with the consent of the carrier to end the transit of goods destined for Bristol in Tennessee at the State line. I do not present this to show upon how narrow a margin of territory may hang this grave question of jurisdiction, but to bring into view the question whether the jurisdiction of either government to regulate the commerce that may be in the transit of the goods can be rationally determined alone, as is done in this bill by the location on the map of the points of shipment and of delivery.

As the purpose of all regulation of interstate commerce must be to control the transit among the States, the law that regulates it must operate upon the goods, the vehicle of transportation, the carrier, the shipper, and all concerned in the transportation at the time the journey is begun, and must continue its control until the destination is reached.

Once the power of the United States has attached to the subject it can not be displaced in favor of the State by the act of the parties engaged in the transportation of the goods.

If the criminal law proposed in this bill is violated in respect of a shipment of goods to Bristol in Tennessee, the crime can not be condoned, nor can the criminal escape punishment by cutting short the journey by a matter of ten feet, and delivering the goods in Bristol, Virginia.

The crime in such cases would consist in the intent to transport goods into Tennessee contrary to this act of Congress, although a lawful agreement was afterwards made between the culprits that they should stop in Virginia 10 feet short of the Tennessee line.

The intent is the crime, if its execution is entered upon, although the thing to be done is not in itself criminal, and although it is never done, but is prevented by a lawful agreement.

I am not attempting to illustrate my point by presenting a difficulty in the execution of the law as proposed in this bill. I am endeavoring to show that it is a mistake, if not a legal impossibility, to measure the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States by the mere fact that the points of delivery and shipment of goods were in different States. This power of Congress rests on quite different grounds than these narrow and embarrassing views of the subject.

If commerce gains a national character because it is shipped from one State to or through another, and in virtue of that character falls within the exclusive protection of Congress, to the exclusion of the right of any State to regulate it, what would be the character of commerce shipped from Buffalo to New York city on a line of railroad running through Pennsylvania? The points of shipment and destination are in the same State; would that fact make it State commerce while it is passing through Pennsylvania? New York could not protect this commerce while it is beyond her borders, and the United States could not protect it because it was State commerce when it was shipped and when it was delivered, and could not change this character while it was in transit.

The geography of the United States was not made the foundation plan on which the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States was laid. It was placed on a higher plane of reason than that, and it can never be justly measured by so low and artificial a standard. If goods are shipped at Knoxville, Tenn., by steamboat to Nashville, which must traverse the Tennessee, Ohio, and Cumberland Rivers, passing a long distance of the route through Alabama, the points of shipment and destination being both in Tennessee, the commerce would not be national in its character, according to this bill, and Congress could not regulate it. Yet for more than half the journey it was beyond the borders of Tennessee.

If there is any case in which the power of Congress to protect this commerce ought to exist it is in the case I have stated, where the State of its origin and delivery can not protect it. Yet the geographical definition of the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States deprives this commerce of all protection while it is not within the State of Tennessee. If this cargo, while passing through Alabama, should meet with some law of that State that imposed upon it any unjust tax, restriction, or burden, or some person, acting under color of such law, to impose such burden, a law of Congress removing such impediments and punishing persons engaged in imposing them on this commerce would find its full warrant in the Constitution and would protect it.

If a thief should steal a part of this cargo while the boat was in Alabama the laws of that State would punish him, whether the commerce on which his raid was directed was State or national in its character. These illustrations sufficiently indicate my view of the nature of the regulations that Congress may enforce in respect of the commerce among the several States and that the points of shipment and delivery are not the proper tests of the limits of this jurisdiction or of the cases to which it is applicable.

I regard it as a deplorable mistake that the decisions of the Supreme Court have rested on this erroneous ground, in which the physical and political geography of the United States is made to define the limits of a power delegated to Congress.

The assumption of this bill is the same that the Supreme Court have made that all articles of commerce intended to be carried from one State to another are, when in transit, subject to the United States laws that regulate the transit. The deduction they make from this premise is that the State laws do not apply to such articles while in transit or to the persons engaged in moving them.

Admitting, as they do, the plenary jurisdiction of the States over all regulations of the transit of commerce completed within their limits, they omit to give any effect to the fact that the laws of the United States in every case must encroach on this State jurisdiction to the extent that they control the transit of articles of commerce within a State.

It may be assumed, without any irreverence or any neglect of filial duty, that it is just as wrong for Congress to interfere with commerce in the States as it is for any State to interfere with the commerce between it and any other State. We ought, if we can, to find some proper and useful field of operation for the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States that will not bring Congress and the State governments into constant and irreconcileable controversy over these delicate and important subjects.

In the case I have mentioned, of the transportation of goods 400 miles, from Alexandria, Va., to the Tennessee line and 20 feet across that line to the point of delivery, it is a patent absurdity to say that a law of the United States that controls the price of the freight through Virginia is not a law that controls and regulates commerce within Virginia. Such an act of Congress is quite as open to question upon constitutional grounds as a law of Virginia would be that provided a fixed rate per ton per mile on freight for the whole distance it is carried within that State.

But under this bill the national character imparted to the freight by consigning it to Bristol in Tennessee rides down and defies the power of Virginia over her own people, her railroads that the State may own, and over commerce and trade in articles grown on her soil, and relegates the entire control of all these to Congress on a margin of ten feet of Tennessee soil included in the designated line of transit. The supremacy of the laws of Congress over those of Virginia in such a case ought to have a more rational basis. On this basis, no matter which of these laws gives the greatest security, justice, equality, and freedom to commerce, the supremacy is accorded to geography. Congress can not create nor can it prohibit commerce between the States in time of peace.

It can not repress commerce between the States by embargo, nor by any other means, except to prevent or repress crime. Its duty is to foster commerce, and to this end it may regulate it by the prevention and surpression of all improper obstructions by State laws that abridge its freedom.

It was the preservation of the freedom of commerce that caused the framers of the Constitution to give to Congress the power to regulate it among the States. The freedom of commerce between the States is as sacred in American policy and constitutional law as the freedom of speech, and, for a better reason, it should not be controlled by statutes, except to prevent the growth of abuses which will in the end destroy its freedom.

These are personal rights which the law may regulate, so as to preserve them and protect their proper enjoyment; but none of them has been placed under the power of any Government, State or Federal, to be admeasured to the people by statutes, or to be clipped and curtailed, from time to time, so as to conform the freedom of their enjoyment to the legislative will.

All our personal liberties came to us under the sheltering wing of the common law, which was wide enough to protect them in the courts without the aid of statutes. But, in forming our more perfect Government, the liberty of unrestricted trade among the States needed to be guarded by special provisions in the Constitution, which gave to them a more cautious security and a plainer recognition than our other personal rights, for the following reasons:

When the States were colonies they had the right, as the dominion of Canada now has, to levy duties on all goods coming into or passing through their respective borders. As to each other they were foreign countries in this respect. After their independence was achieved, when they met in the confederacy, they expressly reserved to each of the States this same power, in the following language, found in the "Articles of Confederation:"

ARTICLE III. The said States hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other for their common defense, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare; binding themselves to assist each other against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretense whatever.

ARTICLE IV. The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different States in this Union, the free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States; and the people of each State shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other State, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions, and restrictions, as the inhabitants thereof respectively: Provided, That such restrictions shall not extend so far as to prevent the removal of property imported into any State to any other State, of which the owner is an inhabitant: Provided, That no imposition, duties, or restriction shall be laid by any State on the property of the United States or either of them.

The next reference to this general topic in the articles of confederation is found in Article IX:

ARTICLE IX. The United States in Congress assembled shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war, except in the cases mentioned in the sixth article; of sending and receiving embassadors; entering into treaties and alliances: Provided, That no treaty of commerce shall be made whereby the legislative power of the respective States shall be restrained from imposing such imposts and duties on foreigners as their own people are subjected to, or from prohibiting the exportation or importation of any species of goods or commodities whatsoever, &c.

The next reference I find is in the same article further on:

The United States in Congress assembled shall also have the sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the alloy and value of coin struck by their own authority, or by that of the respective States; fixing the standard of weights and measures throughout the United States; regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians, not members of any of the States: Provided, That the legislative right of any State within its own limits be not infringed or violated.

The powers thus reserved to the States in the articles of confederation were sovereign attributes, inherent in every independent State. They were the chief barriers to the formation of the "more perfect union;" and the change of these powers and the relations between the States that they created was the chief purpose of the constitutional convention. The subject was considered with the most careful attention. Three most important matters were to be cared for:

1. The privileges and immunities of citizens in each of the States.
2. The powers to be reserved to the States in respect of commerce.
3. The powers to be conferred on Congress over the States and their citizens.

As to the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States, they were preserved in the Constitution as they were declared in the articles of confederation, and almost in the same words.

As to the powers reserved to the States in respect of commerce, their general designation was declared in the tenth amendment of the Constitution, which was only an expression of the true meaning of that instrument, as it was understood by its framers, namely:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

There were reserved to the people in the articles of confederation the following distinct rights:

The people of each State shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other State, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions, and restrictions as the inhabitants thereof respectively.

Under the tenth amendment, which I have just quoted, it is not possible to argue, logically, that the power of Congress "to regulate commerce among the several States" includes this right of the people as to the freedom and privileges of trade and commerce within the States.

These rights were reserved to the people, and their protection was left to the States, as they were under the articles of confederation. They were not conferred upon Congress, nor were they destroyed. They remain, with many others of like kind, under the guardianship of the States. In construing, therefore, the nature and extent of the power conferred upon Congress "to regulate commerce among the several States," we are not permitted to disregard the history of its origin, nor to assume that it was intended to include within its scope the regulation of every right of the citizen connected with or relating to interstate commerce.

While it is admitted by the Supreme Court and by everybody that commerce within a State is a matter over which Congress has no power to legislate, it is not conceded by many that Congress has an equally exclusive right to regulate commerce between the people of the several States.

The instance I have just cited from the Articles of Confederation presents in distinct form a great right of the people that was never given up to the power of Congress, a right so important that the States placed it in their first solemn compact of union as one that should be inviolable. That right survived the formation of the more perfect Union, was placed under the shelter of the tenth amendment, and still exists as strong and distinct as it did when it was guaranteed to the people in express terms in the Articles of Confederation.

If this is a right of the people that we are still bound to respect, while we are regulating commerce among the States it is worth our while to examine it and to see whether Congress is about to ignore or to destroy it.

What is it worth to the people of Minnesota that they shall enjoy in the State of New York "all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions, and restrictions as the inhabitants of" New York? The value of the freedom to commerce of the Erie Canal is one significant answer to that question.

A low rate of freight fixed by a law of New York on wheat conveyed on cars from Buffalo to New York city would be an important matter to the people of Minnesota.

If Congress, in fixing or limiting or controlling or regulating the rates of freight from Saint Paul to New York city, should take the whole subject out of the legislative control of the State of New York because commerce between those cities is interstate commerce, and should give to the canals and railroads in that State the right to charge higher rates on such commerce than they could on commerce that is local, within the State, would not the people of Minnesota be thereby made subject to different "duties, impositions, and restrictions" within the State of New York from those that the people of the latter State would suffer in respect of their local traffic?

The people of Minnesota have the right to every advantage and facility given to commerce by the laws of New York when they are transporting their property through that State or into it, that the people of New York enjoy when transporting their property from place to place within that State.

Congress can neither depreciate nor destroy any right gained by any man under any State law relating to interstate commerce that does not discriminate against the people of another State, or, in some way, injuriously affect their business.

It must be remembered that neither Indian tribes nor foreign nations have the same rights and privileges that our Constitution secures to our own people, and in regulating commerce among our States we must look to the powers of the States and the rights of our people as so many checks and limitations upon the powers of Congress. A commercial regulation of the United States in respect of foreign people or governments can not raise a question in their behalf as to the power of the Government to make it, but the States and the citizens of the United States have a basis of solid rights on which to stand and question the powers of Congress.

These rights are what every power of the Federal Government was intended to secure, and all its powers of legislation are made subordinate to them.

What, then, is included within the power of Congress to "regulate commerce among the several States?" The answer is, whatever is done under color of authority of the laws of any State that taxes, or impedes, or restricts, or in any way discriminates to the disadvantage of the commerce coming from, or through, another State, or that is entering another State, Congress has the right to prohibit and to punish by statute.

The rights of a citizen to the freedom of the markets in other States, and to transport his property into, or through, another State, must be protected by laws that operate among the States to prevent any State from interfering with them. Laws of Congress are needed to protect these rights because the Constitution is not, in these respects, self-executing; and not because the Constitution created the rights, nor because an act of Congress can create them, for it can not create them.

The rights of the people as to the freedom and security of commerce are so important to each individual and to every community, that the framers of our Constitution had the strongest reason to expect that the States, having formerly enjoyed the privilege of regulating commerce with other States, would continue to discriminate in their laws and commercial regulations in favor of their own people. They had to yield the power thus to make discriminations in favor of their own people in respect of duties, charges, and restrictions upon trade, in order to form the more perfect union under the Constitution. They did this reluctantly, and are not yet quite satisfied about it. Continual efforts are now being made by State Legislatures to tax commercial agents, insurance companies, and other commercial agencies of other States. It was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to prevent any such exercise of power by the States, and to aid them in securing to commerce among the States absolute equality and freedom.

To accomplish this it was not necessary that Congress should take hold of the regulation of commerce between man and man, and enact laws to define and settle the infinite variety of questions that arise between common-carriers and the persons who employ them. The States were perfectly competent to do this, as far as the law-making power can do such things, and they never yielded to Congress this wide range of powers. They did yield to Congress as to interstate commerce the full power to regulate it, so as to prevent the States from discriminating in their laws against the people of other States.

In this view of the powers of Congress they are national; in the view that includes within those powers the control of all articles of commerce, all vehicles of commerce, and all persons engaged in commerce or travel that pass from State to State, they become local and lose their national character. Congress should never assume to itself under such a grant of power the right to regulate the charges of warehousemen, commission merchants, wagoners, and draymen, or water-craft that haul or store or sell goods brought from Jersey City to New York, when it is admitted that no such power exists as to goods brought from Brooklyn to New York.

This absurd category was never necessary. The common law covered our whole country, as the air does, and regulated these matters alike in every State. It was never intended to supersede this splendid system of law with all its principles rooted in the experience of our race, and with its intricate adaptation to the protection of every personal and property right connected with commerce by substituting in its place acts of Congress for the regulation of men in their infinitely varied relations to the conduct of commercial affairs. The rights of men, connected with commerce, were as well understood and were as distinct when our Constitution was adopted as they are now. We shall never make them plainer to the courts than they are now. The principles on which they are founded have not been changed or enlarged by the construction of railroads and telegraphs. Neither has the Constitution of the United States been amended by the invention of all these new vehicles of commerce.

The power of Congress to regulate commerce was opposed, in the Constitution, to the selfish greed of the States, and was not given to Congress to aid the citizen in compelling other citizens engaged in commercial pursuits, such as carriers, commission merchants, or bankers, to haul his freights at a rate fixed by law, or to sell them for a commission fixed by law, or to discount his bills drawn against the cargo at a rate fixed by law. If the power to regulate commerce implies, as it must of necessity, the power to regulate all its proximate incidents, we shall find our task, that we are now beginning, endless in its labors, with no stopping place or place of rest short of commercial anarchy.

As we progress with our work of legislating upon the personal rights and duties of men engaged in commerce we shall amend and repeal the common law until our system will be entirely artificial, awaiting every change of competitive railroad lines for the enactment of a new law to meet a new emergency, not of natural trade, but of trade that we have forced into new and unexpected channels. Every new law will be, as this one is, a merely tentative experiment, enacted to find some hoped-for relief from the confusion and trouble we are now about to inflict upon the whole people of the country. We will deprive every shipper of goods, every creator of values in articles of commerce, of the personal right to make a fair contract with a carrier for a fair rate of transportation.

We will substitute commissions, deriving their powers and instructions from the legislative and executive branches of the Government, for the courts, which are the constitutional tribunals for the settlement of the private rights and the redress of wrongs of the citizen.

It seems to me that this bill makes a distinct inroad upon a field that is forbidden to Congress, which will lead to other and further invasions, until the management of railroads must become one of the most absorbing labors of Congress. I dread to enter this field, and will not do it voluntarily.

The States have enough of power, and they have the will, as appears in many instances in their legislation, to handle the railroads, which owe to them their existence and their continued life, so that they shall not abuse the people with extortion, cheat them with unjust discriminations, and bribe their patronage and favor with rebates and other favoritism. I know that it is held by the Supreme Court that their powers are limited to State commerce as distinguished from interstate commerce. I bow to the decision as a citizen. As a legislator I question it with a sense of duty that will not permit me to adopt it as the guide to my vote.

I admit that Congress can overcome all State laws and all the agents empowered to enforce them, and all claiming rights under them, that aid a common carrier to inflict injustice on the people of another State. I go further, and declare that it is the duty of every State to repress and prevent by law within its borders all such wrongs to the people of other States.

The States, almost all of them, have done this; and none of them give the shelter of their laws to any wrong or extortion, discrimination or favoritism, as against their own people, or the people of any other State, in favor of railroad or river carriers.

Laws exist in all the principal railroad States that deal with these wrongs with wise precaution and merited severity of punishments. If these laws were permitted to operate as they are entitled to do the evil we use now trying to suppress would not have appeared.

The States can not deal with commerce within their own borders carried upon railroads or rivers that reach them, without affecting in some important way interstate commerce. Neither can Congress deal with interstate commerce so as to avoid touching, in a material way, State commerce.

Friction and conflict will occur in a large percentage of the cases, involving at once the grave questions of power and jurisdiction that often arise in our dual system of government. If this can be avoided by a reasonable construction of the Constitution, I earnestly plead that Congress will adopt it, and so declare. This is a political question, involving the right of Congress to refuse to go beyond the limits of its legislative power, and if Congress, following the broad road of construction, now become a highway for the guidance of the States and the people, will plant their decision firmly on that, and deny to themselves a power that is doubtful, obscure, and ill-defined, dangerous, and leading to licentious abuses, rather than adopt a construction of the Constitution that is technical and is confined to the letter of the text, to the destruction of its spirit, its right to declare this to be a political question will be conceded; and the States will be free in their efforts to throttle the railroads in their persecutions of the people.

Congress has power to pass uniform laws of bankruptcy, yet such laws may be enacted by the States to operate upon their own citizens, or upon non-residents when they appear in the proceedings, without any grant of power for that purpose in the Constitution. If the United States occupy the field, however, with a general bankrupt law, while it is so occupied the States can not act in this matter.

Congress can improve the bay of Mobile, but when no law of the United States for that purpose is in operation, though such laws existed before and after the State began a work of like improvement, the State law authorizing such work in that bay is valid, and such a law was enforced by the Supreme Court of the United States in Kimball vs. The City of Mobile.

Why the States may not, in the absence of laws enacted by Congress, pass laws to facilitate all commerce, State and interstate, by repressing all extortionate and discriminative conduct of public carriers, when they can facilitate commerce by deepening bays and channels, I can not understand. Counterfeiting the coins, money, bonds, and other securities of the United States may be punished by the States although they are prohibited from coining money or emitting bills of credit. In every crime against the Federal Government, and in every impediment to its lawful authority, the people of the States are deeply concerned, and the States may aid in the duty of removing the one and punishing the other.

Their laws, adapted to these ends, may have extra-territorial effect in the consequences resulting from their enforcement, but they do not operate, as laws, beyond the boundaries of the States enacting them. Their effect, if they aid the common law in repressing wrongs done to the people, are precisely in line with the purposes of legislation that are at the foundation of this bill. If the effect is otherwise, they are in restraint of free commerce, and Congress can annul them by its powers of legislation rightfully included in the power to regulate commerce among the several States.

I can not subscribe to the doctrine that interstate commerce can only receive protection against the wrongful acts of private persons, or public and private corporations, through the action of Congress in providing laws and tribunals for their regulation or punishment.

This bill is based solely on that false premise. It opens the door to the interference of Congress with every regulation of trade and commerce, whether sanctioned by universal custom or by express or implied agreements between the parties concerned. It exposes the charter rights of every railroad company, given by the States, to modification and repeal by acts of Congress.

It multiplies indefinitely the list of crimes punishable by statute in the Federal courts, and correspondingly narrows the power of the States to punish their own citizens for crimes committed within their borders, because the commerce against which the crime is directed is interstate commerce, and is therefore within the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress.

This claim of the exclusive power of Congress to legislate, whether for the freedom of commerce or against it, is made in this bill to depend on the interstate character of the traffic, and that is made to depend on the will of the shipper. The States can make no regulations touching the subject, or objects of interstate commerce, according to the theory of this bill and of the Supreme Court. If they should enact statutes for the punishment of crimes against interstate commerce committed by their own people, in the very language of this bill their laws would fall to the ground because, as this bill assumes, they could not touch the subject.

The States, it appears, can take an officer from the Army or Navy or from one of the civil Departments of the United States and hang him for murder; but they can not, on the theory of this bill, punish a man for killing an engine or kidnapping an engineer who is about to cross the line of a State and enter another State if he is engaged in interstate commerce, and is for that reason under the sole jurisdiction of the United States.

Congress has power to regulate interstate commerce, but there is a limit to this power, and it is not so far an exclusive power as to annul all acts of the State Legislature, as well in the absence as in the presence of laws of Congress, through which this power may be exerted.

For a hundred years the States have assisted and protected interstate commerce by their many statutes and by many hundreds of judgments in their courts. Congress, doubting the extent of its powers, has permitted this assistance and protection on the part of the States, and, in doing so, has blessed the country by its silence and inaction. In that time commerce has hewn its own highways through the mountains and built its grand structures across great rivers and chasms; the arid deserts have bloomed under its footsteps, the wilderness has bowed a welcome to its coming, and every river and bay opening into lakes or oceans has floated the burden of its wealth out among the nations of the earth.

The States have done all this, so far as legislation has been required to assist commerce in its wonderful struggle for freedom and expansion. They granted the charters to the railroads; they protected the railroads and those who dealt with them by State laws; they did it all, knowing that the purpose of all these great enterprises was to create and conduct interstate commerce.

The States consented to the consolidation of railroad lines leading into other States, and so made of them lines for interstate commerce. Without that consent, Congress could have had no jurisdiction over a foot of these lines according to the theory of the Supreme Court; with it, Congress claims exclusive jurisdiction over the entire lines of railway thus consolidated and the power to repeal every State law existing when the consolidation was made that was intended to protect commerce over them.

When these laws were enacted they were valid, because the commerce over these lines was, as to the railroads, necessarily commerce within the States; when the lines of railway were extended by consolidation the laws became invalid according to the theory of this bill, because they then applied to interstate commerce. Thus, if the theory of this bill is true the States, by consenting to such consolidation, gave new powers to Congress and made sudden havoc of all laws enacted by them for the protection of their railways and the commercial traffic they were engaged in. I do not accept the verity of this legislative romance.

In legislating to regulate commerce it is impossible to follow a line that will truly demark the limits of the power to regulate it so as to distinguish between the subject and the object, the traffic and the things that are transported, bought, or sold; or between the traffic and the persons engaged in it. The power to regulate commerce includes the regulation of all of these.

If there is any limit upon the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States, it is not to be found in the nature of the commerce, the points of shipment and destination, or the special character of the business in which the carrier is engaged; for every regulation by Congress based on these circumstances detracts from the power of the States reserved to them in the Constitution, as I think I have shown, over their own people and over their commerce, while they are yet within their own limits.

But there is a limit to this power of Congress, and it is found in the purpose for which the power was given. That purpose, I repeat, was to protect interstate commerce in absolute freedom from the power of the States to control it within their own limits by any law or regulation that would operate to the detriment of the people of other States. A State law that imposed no such restraints or burdens on interstate commerce, but increased its freedom and security, is a valid law; but a State law that does impose any such burdens or restraints upon interstate commerce would fall under the denunciation of the Constitution; and Congress would have the power, as well as the courts, to annul the law and free commerce from its burdens.

The power of Congress under such limitations is benign and useful. Without such limitations it is dangerous, and will become aggressive and uncontrollable. It will end in making merchandise of politics, while it rules and ruins the commerce of trade.

I dread to set in motion a doubtful and dangerous power which will soon become a factor of immense influence in the party politics of this Republic. It is urged that the railroads will absorb and corrupt the State Legislatures if we leave to them the duty of checking their enormous powers. The thirty-eight Legislatures number more than four thousand men.

Is it easier to corrupt four thousand men, scattered through thirty-eight States, than it is to corrupt four hundred who are assembled in Washington? Or, is it easier to corrupt these four hundred representatives than it is to corrupt five commissioners intrusted with very broad discretionary powers? I believe it is not.

It is urged that the States are too weak to encounter these railroad barons and their retainers—these vast corporations and their employés. The States, I think, can be safely trusted to take care of their own people. If they ever exhibit any weakness, it will not be the weakness of indifference to the rights, or wrongs, of their people.

The same sentiment that will influence one State will impel all of them to use their full powers to protect their people against extortion, discrimination, favoritism, and any form of oppression that the railroads may attempt to practice upon them.

The States will oppose the powers of thirty-eight great sovereignties—the same that created the railroad corporations—against that of the timid owners of great accumulations of capital. That contest can not be doubtful if the State governments are honest. If the people are honest, as they are free, they will have honest State governments.

If Congress, instead of holding the States in check by a constant distrust or denial of their powers, will open their way to the full and free control of the men and corporations engaged in domestic commerce, through civil and criminal laws, and will hold over the States its corrective authority, so as to prevent any of them from doing injustice to the other States or their people, the States will soon settle all the knotty problems about long and short hauls, pools, drawbacks, bribes, and bonuses, and will close the doors of their penitentiaries upon those who offend against their laws made to secure the people against wrong and the honest freedom of commerce against injustice and obstruction.

If we will respect the rights reserved to the people under the ninth and tenth amendments of the Constitution and the protection of which was reserved to the States because they were not placed under the powers delegated to Congress, the description of which I have already quoted from the language of the Articles of Confederation, we need give ourselves no concern about the care with which the States will guard these rights of the people.

I admit all that has been said about the wrongs and injustice that the people have suffered through the overbearing insolence and oppression of the railroad companies. Their greed is destructive to the people and the governments from whom they derived their powers, but in finding a remedy for this evil I neither wish to find for the people a new master, remote from them and their influence, in the Congress of the United States, nor to place in the hands of that master a power over their trade and traffic more dangerous than the power of the railroad companies.

In Alabama we have four great staples of commerce. They are cotton, timber, coal, and iron. Each of them must find a market far distant from home. Iron, coal, and lumber must find their market by rail in the interior of the United States, at least for the present. High prices for long hauls on railroads are the best inventions for the destruction of these industries. If I had no other reason for disagreeing to this bill that one would determine my vote; but I have stated others in which everybody is equally concerned.

True, it must be that this bill would drive all our heavy productions to the coast, and the Alabama River would float them to the sea at Mobile as the cheapest line of transportation. This will come after a while in spite of railroads and the rates of long hauls or short hauls. I will greatly rejoice when that day arrives. But to force it now by cutting off our mines, forests, and cotton fields from the benefits of fair rates of railroad transportation and from the advantages of fair rates of freight on the return shipments of food products of the Northwest, on which their industries must rely, would be to them and to the country an incalculable evil against which I must protest.

As I read this bill, the interpretation of which is so uncertain that every one must needs adopt his own, it necessitates an increase of rates on long hauls of freight in every case where the roads can not sacrifice a large part of their income and still live. I am convinced that the roads leading to our mineral fields in Alabama can not do this, and the burden will fall very heavily upon our new industries and probably destroy them.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to withdraw that motion to allow me to make a statement.

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to state to the Senate that I am exceedingly anxious to have the interstate commerce bill disposed of at as early a day as is practicable consistent with deliberate discussion. I therefore wish to announce that on Tuesday or Wednesday, at the furthest, of next week I shall ask the Senate to remain in session until the subject is disposed of.

Mr. HOAR. I hope that will not be done. Here is a proposition which, in my judgment, would be destructive to great business interests in the country, especially to the export business of the principal city of the State which I represent. I hope the public interests affected will have a full opportunity to be heard. We shall do very little business on Saturday, and I hope the Senator from Illinois will not undertake to shorten the discussion.

Mr. CULLOM. In answer to that I will state that I think the Senate and country have had quite a period of time since the conference report was made, and it does not in very many particulars differ from the bill which passed the Senate a year ago.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator from Illinois will insist on finishing the bill to-morrow.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that in my judgment, with due reference to the Senator's greater ability, the bill if passed will not interfere with foreign commerce at all or the interests of the city and State he represents.

Mr. CAMERON. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair). Pending that motion the Chair will lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received from the House of Representatives this day, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

A bill (H. R. 10394) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 10397) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes.

CALIFORNIA SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to withdraw a motion entered by me at the last session to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. 990) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands. On my motion the House was requested to return the bill, and I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. I now ask leave to withdraw that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Kansas has been heard. Is there objection? If not, the motion to reconsider is withdrawn.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 7, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate the 6th day of January, 1887.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

Thomas P. Bashaw, to be United States district attorney for the eastern district of Missouri, vice William H. Bliss, resigned.

MINISTER AND MINISTER RESIDENT.

Thomas C. Manning, to be envoy extraordinary and minister resident of the United States to Mexico, vice Henry R. Jackson, resigned.

Hugh A. Dinsmore, to be minister resident and consul-general of the United States to Corea, vice William H. Parker, resigned.

CONSUL.

Robert E. Culberth, to be consul of the United States at Apia, vice Berthold Greenebaum, resigned.

CONFIRMATION.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate January 6, 1887.

POSTMASTER.

J. A. Israel, to be postmaster at Salida, in the county of Chaffee and State of Colorado.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 6, 1887.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

W. W. JOHNSON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with inclosures, an estimate from the Attorney-General of an appropriation to pay W. W. Johnson for services in prosecuting Jessie H. Robeson for embezzlement of United States post-office funds and letters; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

J. W. JACOBS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with inclosures, an estimate from the Attorney-General of an appropriation to pay J. W. Jacobs, sheriff of Keokuk County, Iowa, for services in arresting persons concerned in the burglary at the post-office in Webster City, Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PATRICK K. WINSTON, JR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with inclosures, an estimate from the Attorney-General of an appropriation to pay Patrick K. Winston, jr., for legal services in the defense of Thomas Hill, captain of police, Nez Percé agency; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AUGUSTUS G. RUGGLES VS. UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with inclosures, a letter from the Third Auditor relative to the discrepancy between the amount of judgment in favor of Augustus G. Ruggles against the United States and the amount appropriated therefor in the deficiency appropriation act of August 4, 1886; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

STATISTICS OF SURGICAL OPERATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, an estimate by the Commissioner of Pensions of an appropriation for the collection of statistics relative to the influence of surgical operations; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STEWART, of Texas, till Monday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, for two weeks, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. BARRY, for to-day.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 1689) to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company was referred to the Committee on Claims; the bill (H. R. 6191) relating to the same subject was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Subsequently the report of the Comptroller of the Currency with accompanying documents relating to this subject has been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and that committee has now charge of the subject. If there be no objection those two committees will be discharged from the consideration of the bills indicated, and they will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1689) to reimburse depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by the failure of said company, and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims; and the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6191) to amend section 8 of an act approved February 21, 1881, entitled "An act amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company and for other purposes," and the same was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. HERBERT. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

ANNIE E. GARDINER.

Mr. LOVERING, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the bill (S. 2660) granting a pension to Annie E. Gardiner; and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

GEORGE SCHNEIDER.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 306) granting a pension to George Schneider; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Pensions, also reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (S. 1047) for the relief of Patrick H. Estes, a veteran invalid soldier of the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Pensions, also reported back with adverse recommendations bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 2200) granting a pension to William Gilmore; and

A bill (H. R. 1553) for the relief of Sarah Carter.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills begins at 17 minutes past 12 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Railways and Canals.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE ERIE AND OSWEGO CANALS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 1577) for the improvement of the Erie and Oswego Canals.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1577) for the permanent improvement of the Erie and Oswego Canals, and to secure the freedom of the same to the commerce of the United States. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER] has five minutes of his time remaining, fifty-five minutes having been consumed in the reading of the report and by the gentleman in the remarks which he made yesterday.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. But, Mr. Chairman, is there not another hour to-day?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair merely announced that there were five minutes remaining of the time to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER] is entitled.

Mr. RANDALL. Can not we have a vote on this bill now? I do not think it is very likely to pass, and instead of discussing it we might better save the time for other business.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. We do not want a vote upon this bill until we get the Hennepin Canal attached to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be informed who controls the balance of the hour to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. Any gentleman who is recognized after the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER] will be entitled to the floor.

Mr. WEBER. But is not the hour under the control of the chairman of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the committee was recognized and yielded to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER].

Mr. WEBER. I understood that he was to yield to me the balance of the time to-day.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER] that when his time expires some other member of the committee will take the floor and will yield him as much additional time as he requires.

Mr. WEBER. That will be satisfactory.

During the delivery of the concluding portion of his address the following proceedings took place:

The CHAIRMAN (after Mr. WEBER had spoken five minutes). The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PLUMB was recognized.

Mr. PLUMB. I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER], how much additional time he requires.

Mr. WEBER. I think about twenty minutes.

Mr. PLUMB. Then, Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEBER], and after that I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. WEBER then concluded his remarks.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I am much obliged to my friend from Illinois [Mr. PLUMB] for giving me an opportunity to express my hearty concurrence in the object designed to be attained by the bill before us. In brief, it proposes that in the event the State of New York shall double the length of the locks in the Erie Canal and deepen the draught of water to 9 feet, the Government of the United States will then reimburse the State of New York in the sum of five millions of dollars. To the feature of the bill which proposes to make this reimbursement in the form of bonds, I am opposed, preferring to pay directly five millions out of the Treasury rather than to make any further issue of bonds.

But as to the object to be attained by the proposed enlargement and improvement of the Erie canal as the great artery of lake commerce, in my judgment the State of Kansas has a greater direct interest in the attainment of that object than has the State of New York; for this simple reason: Every one knows that the farmer who raises wheat, or ships corn or hay in the form of pork or beef, always pays the freight to the final market. Now, the enlargement of this canal, enabling boats to carry double the cargoes they now carry, will necessarily have the effect of reducing the rate of freight upon grain at least 2 cents per bushel, and when the State of Kansas raises and ships 50,000,000 bushels of wheat, the farmers raising that wheat will receive for it $1,000,000 more in price than they now receive, simply because there will be a saving of $1,000,000 of freight upon the shipment. A similar reduction would occur on all kinds of traffic. And what is true of Kansas is true of Kentucky, of Ohio, of Indiana, of Missouri, of all the Northwestern States and of the Southern States.

For this reason, sir, there has been no measure proposed at this session of Congress which seems to me to promise more direct practical and lasting benefit to the great farming interest of the country than the proposed enlargement of this canal, and for this reason I regard it as a national and not in the least as a State measure.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another reason why I advocate the bill, namely, the fact that the Erie Canal stands to-day as the great check upon the rapacity of the railway companies in their freight charges. It would be worth a hundred million dollars to the New York Central, the Erie, the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore and Ohio, and the other trunk lines if, by any means, they could wipe out the Erie Canal. And, just to the extent that this is true, it is true also that it is to the interest of the people of the whole nation, and especially of the farming classes, to take care that the Erie Canal not only shall not be suffered to pass into disuse, not only that it shall not be kept at its present limited capacity, but shall speedily have that capacity enlarged and given the greatest efficiency.

You will find in the near future that the control of freight charges must chiefly be effected by water ways. Coming from the State which I in part represent, I shall advocate, not only this enlargement of the Erie Canal, but also the construction of the Hennepin Canal. Why? In order that we of the West may have a direct water way to serve as the great controller of all the trunk lines, whether they pool or do not pool, whether you have an interstate-commerce bill or not. In other words, the good God who made this world, who so constituted things that there is less friction in moving vast weights through water than there is in carrying them by any means on land, gave to us a principle of nature which is higher and more effective than any other which can be formulated in an interstate-commerce bill or similar legislation of Congress.

The real relief for the present, and also for the future, to the people of the country against the ruthless greed of railways is in waterway communication. By this I do not mean the building of a lot of levees away up above the surface of the water on the Mississippi, or tumbling a million or two of dollars into some scheme that can not furnish a great national highway, but I mean the development of such water ways as will give to the people of the West and the South direct communication with the Atlantic seaboard, so that cheap transportation by water shall stand as the great corrective, through competition, of the, at present, unbridled rapacity of the railroads. The following statement by Mr. Dodge shows how broad and important an interest is at stake:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1885.

SIR: The conclusion of our work of revision of estimates enables me to give the amount of grain affected abstractly by the cheapening of canal freights from Buffalo west to the Missouri. The product is thus given:

States.	Bushels.	States.	Bushels.
West Virginia	3,318,000	Iowa	31,270,000
Kentucky	13,425,000	Missouri	27,500,000
Ohio	41,186,000	Kansas	34,990,000
Michigan	29,772,000	Nebraska	28,325,000
Indiana	33,745,000	Dakota	22,330,000
Illinois	32,374,000
Wisconsin	20,083,000	Total	359,625,000
Minnesota	41,307,000

On the amount as above given by Mr. Dodge 2 cents per bushel would give $7,000,000 to the farmers.

Mr. PLUMB. I now yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to say that, as a member of the Committee on Railways and Canals, I voted for this report; but I am not pleased to see the little attention that is paid by members on this floor when a matter of this importance is brought before them and their intelligent action demanded. I listened with pride, as well as pleasure, to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON].

Like him, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this canal. And I favor it for the same reasons that I favor the construction of the Hennepin Canal. Because we all know that while "the course of empire westward takes its way," commerce makes its course eastward; and wherever you can connect two great bodies of water like the ocean and the lakes or the lakes and the Mississippi River, thereby aiding transportation and reducing its expense, you do that much toward accomplishing an end, the attainment of which is with the American people to-day all over this Union a matter of serious thought and constant agitation.

Why, sir, let me ask, is there anything that has agitated the public mind in this country in the last few years more than the interstate-commerce bill—whether the Reagan or the Cullom bill? And what is the object that the people look to in this agitation? Is it not that the producer of the West and the consumer of the East may get some relief from the burdens which have been imposed upon them by the railroad monopolies?

Now, what is the first proposition? Any man who has given this matter any thought or consideration knows that water transportation is 50 per cent. cheaper than any other mode of transportation. If, then, it is the cheapest, why should we not bend our energies in the right direction, instead of wasting our breath in wholesale declarations which result in no practical good? What the people want to-day is practical results—some relief from the burdens which have been imposed upon them in the past. Hence, while I favor the improvement of all our water ways, whether North or South, East or West—rivers, harbors, or canals—I take this position because I believe it will reduce the extortionate rates of the railroads, and furnish to the consumer and the producer cheaper traffic than they now enjoy.

Mr. PLUMB. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allotted to me I can do little more than simply testify to the "faith that is in me" with respect to this question of cheap water transportation. One of the most important questions that has engrossed the attention of Congress during the last dozen or more years is the question of affording cheaper and better transportation facilities. This is a question in which the people throughout the length and breadth of this land feel intense interest; and this feeling among the people has found expression in legislation of various kinds in nearly all the States of this Union. But it has been found that such legislation is insufficient to accomplish the purpose sought—to make through transportation from the interior of the country to the seaboard cheaper and better than it has been.

For the last eight or ten years a large portion of the time of the Congress of the United States has been engrossed with this matter of cheap transportation. We have had the Reagan and the Cullom bills, so-called, and we have discussed those matters, and to-day, perhaps, there is no proposition pending in Congress, aside from fiscal and tariff legislation, so engrossing and of such importance to the people at large as this matter of regulating and controlling interstate commerce and our transportation from the interior to the seaboard.

While we can do a great deal, Mr. Chairman, in the shape of legislation, I feel confident there is nothing so effective, and which will accomplish so much good for the whole country, as this matter of enlarging and extending the Erie Canal. Coming, as I do, from the country at the headwaters of the Mississippi and Saint Lawrence Rivers, from a country which is one of the greatest cereal-producing sections of this Union, we have a vital interest in having our transportation facilities made as cheap, as fair, and as equitable as possible. And our people can conceive of no method so efficacious, so fully regulating this matter of the carrying trade of the Northwest to the seaboard as enlarging and extending our canals.

In my own State, and in the Territory of Dakota, during this last year, nearly 90,000,000 bushels of wheat were produced, and the bulk of that wheat finds its outlet to the eastern seaboard. It passes down the chain of great lakes to Buffalo, and thence to New York and other ports. And I venture the assertion, Mr. Chairman, if we could have the Erie Canal enlarged so that vessels drawing from 15 to 20 feet of water could be used in the transportation of this grain, without breaking bulk, it would make a difference in the profit of our farmers of a million dollars annually. In the district I represent, sir, 20,000,000 bushels of wheat were raised last year, of which, beside what we use for home consumption, nearly all finds its way to the seaboard through the chain of great lakes by way of the Erie Canal. At least 12,000,000 bushels of the 20,000,000 raised in my district are thus shipped and exported. At the rate of 5 cents per bushel—the amount saved by transportation over this water route as against railroad transportation if untrameled—$600,000 would be saved annually to the farmers of my district. This water route is emphatically one of the greatest regulators of railroad rates.

Mr. PLUMB. I will now yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not rise to discuss the merits of the proposition, but to call attention to what seem to me to be some defects of detail in the bill. The bill provides for the payment by the General Government to the State of New York, upon compliance with certain conditions, of the sum of $5,000,000. This payment is to be made, not in cash, but in bonds.

In my judgment if this payment is to be made at all it should be made in cash. We hear much about the surplus of cash in the Treasury. Millions of dollars are now locked up in its vaults and thus withdrawn from circulation and use in business. Why issue more bonds while this cash lies idle? It is true that various plans for reducing this surplus have been talked about, but so far the only bill affecting the revenue the members of this House have been given an opportunity to consider is a bill the undoubted effect of which would be to largely increase this surplus by stimulating importations. The majority of the members of this House have so far thought it inadvisable to further increase the surplus, and especially so at the expense of American skill and American labor, and so have voted on two separate occasions not to consider that bill.

Bills, many in number, to reduce or abolish the internal-revenue taxes have been offered here, but not one of them has been allowed to come up for action. Internal-revenue taxes are, in essence and in fact, war taxes, and yet those who cry the loudest against war taxes would not touch those. Without intending at this time to indicate my own views upon this question, I will express the opinion that the demand for the abolition or material reduction of these internal taxes is rapidly becoming stronger and more widespread.

Only this morning I received the following petition:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The petition of the undersigned, citizens of Camden and other places in the State of New Jersey, respectfully represents:

1. That internal taxation was resorted to by the General Government as a war measure and should not be maintained during times of peace. A number of internal taxes, which were impediments to commerce or were petty exactions which annoyed and cost the people more than they benefited the revenue, were wisely repealed in 1883.

2. Others produce an enormous and unnecessary revenue, creating a surplus which endangers the economical administration of the Government.

3. The tax on tobacco is an exceptional burden upon agriculture.

4. The tax on spirits requires an army of detectives and another army of soldiers to prevent illicit distillation and keeps portions of the country in a disturbed condition. As spirits are largely used in the arts and in medicines the tax on them is a real burden upon the people who use them for these purposes or who consume the articles produced from them. Repeal of this tax would tend to do away with the injurious adulterations now extensively practiced.

5. The collection of internal taxes involves a supervision by the Government, which employs several thousand agents at a cost of millions of dollars annually.

For these reasons we pray that the internal taxes may be reduced as rapidly as the condition of the Treasury will allow.

Whatever plan may be ultimately agreed upon for this reduction, one thing must be beyond question—no more bonds should be issued for any purpose while so large a surplus remains.

A second defect, it seems to me, in the bill is the provision which directs the payment of this sum upon the certificate of the officials of the State of New York that the canal has been deepened and the locks lengthened, as required by the bill. No provision is made for any inspection by any official of the Government before the payment is to be made. It seems to me that before any payment is made this Government should be advised by the report of its own engineers or other proper officers that the work the bill requires the State to do has been fully and properly performed.

Another point: If the Erie Canal is to be deepened, as this bill proposes, at the expense of the General Government, it is a serious question whether this bill goes far enough. It only proposes a net depth of 8 feet. That would afford but little relief, and it would still necessitate reshipment from the lake vessels to lighter-draught vessels at the head of the canal, as the average draught of lake vessels is about 13 feet. If the canal were deepened so as to allow vessels loaded at Duluth and other lake ports to pass through it to tide-water, then the project certainly would assume more of a national importance than it has in its present shape. Such a project may be impracticable; but, on the other hand, is not the present one, in its present shape, of doubtful use, or at least of but limited national importance?

Mr. PLUMB. I yield now to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes allotted to me on a bill of this character, and representing as I do on this floor the second great commercial city of the State of New York, I feel disinclined to enter into any of the particular merits of the pending measure, and will simply say, on behalf of my own constituency, that while the State of New York at present is divided as to the means that may be adopted, the pecuniary considerations or plans for the fiduciary aid which may be brought to this enterprise, they are all of one mind as to its utility, as to the demands of commerce for its enlargement; and as is evident to-day from the Western Representatives who have spoken on this measure, it is the demand of the Western producers that their commodities, that their products should reach by as cheap waterway as possible the Eastern consumers.

The Federal side of aid for the Erie Canal has been presented so ably by my colleague [Mr. WEBER], both through the report and through his remarks, that I feel disinclined to say one word for or against the dividing question in my State. We have had two canal conventions called along the line of the canal—delegated conventions, representing commercial bodies, associations, &c., and these conventions have declared, unequivocally, that the present State aid should prevail in settling this question for the present. Yet I am free to say that in the State of New York, within the last year, there has grown a large and determined opinion in favor of Federal aid, if not immediately, yet in the near future. I am satisfied that the solution of this question, although by this Congress it may be relegated to another, yet within six years at the furthest the American Congress must take it up and settle it. This bill, were there a guarantee from the State as to its bonds, would meet my co-operation and my heartiest indorsement.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Chair be kind enough to state what amount of time is yet remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Seventeen minutes of the hour remain.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I would request the Chair to notify me when

I shall have exhausted sixteen minutes, as I desire to reserve one minute for the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. DAVIDSON].

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, there has not been presented to this House a more important question than that which now engages its attention. It is, sir, nothing less than a question of public improvements upon a scale that has not hitherto received legislative favor for many years. It is a question that many years ago claimed the attention of the foremost thinkers and ablest statesmen in this land.

Long before those troubles which culminated in the late war engrossed the public mind the thought of the country was in the direction of public improvements; and distinguished statesmen from every part of the country were its ardent advocates. We have now entered upon the era of peace. We are now discussing the questions which pertain to peace, and that being the case we most naturally turn our attention to the great question of our public improvements.

It has been urged against improvements of this character being undertaken by the General Government that they are altogether within one of the States, and that therefore they should not receive the encouragement and support of the Federal treasury, and some have gone so far as to declare such support unconstitutional, and yet it has been the constant practice to make just such improvements.

It is not a question whether the improvement is wholly within a State or whether it extends through all of the States. The question is this, and this only: Is it for the benefit of the whole people of the country?

Why, sir, we have without hesitation voted millions of dollars to improve a river—the Tennessee River—entirely within the State of Alabama, the object of the improvement being to better the navigation of that river to improve the commerce of that section of country. Now, if we look at the amount of commerce that is interested in the improvement of this great New York canal and compare it with the commerce affected by the improvement of the Tennessee River, we shall find ten arguments in favor of the former to one in favor of the latter.

This proposition is demonstrated by a consideration of the following facts, showing the amount of goods made in this country and imported from abroad, as shown by estimates based on the census of 1880 and the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury for the past year:

Total value of manufactures in the United States for the year 1886	$6,228,711,861
Value of goods imported	625,000,000
Total	6,853,711,861

It will be conceded that by far the greater portion of these goods is made and sold in the East for transportation and distribution in the West and must be affected by the freight rates paid thereon.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what do we propose? We propose to improve navigation and cheapen transportation on articles that are produced in the West and consumed in the East. Have we any idea how much we do produce in the West? In that region of country what articles, what numbers of tons, what numbers of bushels of grain are to be transported the transportation of which will be reduced in cost by the proposed improvement? Sir, I hold in my hand a statement, which is taken from authentic sources, which shows the quantities of cereals raised in the great grain-growing States of the West, but I will confine my statement to the quantities produced in six States and Territories.

The following tables are compiled from the report of the statistician, Department of Agriculture, No. 25, made to Hon. Norman J. Colman, Commissioner, for the year 1885:

Have you the slightest idea how much this is? It is, sir, a quantity so vast that the human mind can not easily grasp its magnitude. As an illustration, if these products were loaded on wagons and thirty feet granted to each wagon for travel-way, and were started around the globe in one continuous train, it would reach eight times around the world. That single train that would load up this crop of cereals raised in these six States of the West! With eight wagons abreast in one train, it would reach once around the globe, and this, be it remembered, with the products of these States in one single year.

Mr. Chairman, although there is but a small portion of these cereals transported, yet it must be admitted that every bushel produced is affected in value by the cost of transportation, and if the cost of transportation increases the value of this amount only 1 cent a bushel it would make a total of $15,000,000 per annum; and, sir, it is shown by the following tables that years of experience have demonstrated the fact that the saving between water and railroad transportation between the cities of Chicago and New York amounts to 6 cents a bushel instead of 1.

There can be no question about the necessity for this work. The amount required is only $5,000,000 of 2½ per cent. bonds to be issued by the United States, while the saving to each of the great States of the West—I mean those that lie west of Chicago, and that are devoted chiefly to the production of cereals—would be equal to the amount of the expenditure for this work.

As I said, sir, in the beginning, the time has come for us to see what can be done by improving these channels of commerce and thus reducing the cost of freight. We have a vast amount of money in the Treasury lying idle, and there is so much concern about the surplus that it has even been suggested, as I understand, to call an extra session of Congress to dispose of the surplus. But if we were doing our duty, if we were turning our attention to the subject of canals and rivers and the improvement of our commerce, and spending the surplus as we might profitably, there would be no such question to be raised. It is a mistake, sir, to suppose that the people of the United States are so anxious to get rid of taxation that they are unwilling to have this money used in the best way to promote their welfare. Every dollar of surplus now in the Treasury of the United States might be used profitably in the way to bring back to each of the people of the United States a hundred-fold profit, and it is well now to turn our attention in that direction.

By a wise selection of such public improvements as are to-day actually required for the cheapening of transportation and a vigorous prosecution of these, work, labor, and capital would find profitable employment, and all strikes and rumors of strikes would at once cease.

I hope this measure will become a law. I hope, sir, that not only this but the Hennepin Canal itself will be provided for before the close of the session, and that we shall enter upon the great business of securing cheap transportation for the people of the West as well as the people of the East.

It should be remembered that more than one-half of all that is produced and all that is consumed moves west in a line from New York to Chicago. This is the great thoroughfare necessarily of the nation. It is in that isothermal line where business moves. It is here that population goes westward, and it is in this line that traffic goes eastward. The amount of that traffic can hardly be conceived. The amount of it has already been shown by the manufactures that are produced in the United States.

It is safe to conclude that more than one-half of all this vast amount of goods moves westward over the line occupied by the Erie Canal and which it is contemplated to improve; that it goes to the great valley of the Mississippi; goes to that valley where more than one-half of the population of the United States now resides; goes to that valley that has more acres of tillable land than any other portion of the country; goes where there are more goods consumed and where there are more cereals produced than in any other portion. This is the great thoroughfare. Nature intended it to be the track of a great water course. The Adirondacks were pushed back seemingly on purpose to give space to the Mohawk River in order that the Erie Canal might find its way to the chain of lakes; and the chain of lakes carries on the line to Chicago, that great city of the West, the greatest distributing point of the interior.

The proposition is to improve the navigation between the metropolis on the sea-coast and the great inland metropolis, the city of Chicago. It is of the utmost importance to this country, and the small pittance that is asked in this bill can be given without any serious injury to any part and with decided advantage to the whole country. I hope, sir, when the time comes for a vote upon this bill it may receive the cordial support of this House, and become a law.

I have but one more remark to submit and I am done. I know that there is a common feeling that the day has passed for the building of canals. This sentiment has obtained to such an extent that it almost passes for an axiom. It is said that we must build railroads and not canals. But I desire the committee to take notice of this fact, that the attention of the civilized world is now being called anew to the building of canals everywhere.

Sir Vernon Harcourt, in his late work on rivers and canals, says there are in use in Great Britain 3,138½ miles of canal; in France, 2,954 miles; while Holland and Italy are famed for their extensive systems of canals. In India canals are utilized for both irrigation and transportation, one of the most important being the Lower Ganges Canal, 582 miles in length, just completed. In concluding a chapter on canals this distinguished authority says:

It is evident that rivers and canals, when properly maintained and developed, still form important routes of inland communication. Their commercial value has in most cases been considerably impaired by railways, but they are gradually recovering from the depression into which they were thrown by the keen competition of the railway systems. Though canals can not hope to compete with railways in the conveyance of passengers and of light, perishable articles, it is certain they possess advantages for the transport of heavy and bulky goods.

He concludes by saying:

Canals, if maintained, extended, and, when necessary, enlarged, as is being done now in France, and if not suffered to fall into the hands of the proprietors of railways traversing the same districts, both foster a healthy competition with railways and tend consequently to reduce the cost of transport to the advantage of the public.

I have prepared, Mr. Chairman, a series of statements of facts which I have not taken the time of the committee to read. But I will ask for myself the privilege of incorporating them in my remarks, and I also ask that other gentlemen may have the like privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PLUMB] asks unanimous consent that any gentleman may be permitted to print remarks on this subject.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Lest my position with regard to this bill might be misunderstood I desire to say I do not favor the bill; and at another time, if it should become necessary, I will state the reasons for my opposition. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour for the consideration of bills under the rule has expired, and the committee will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1577) for the permanent improvement of the Erie and Oswego Canals, and to secure the freedom of the same to the commerce of the United States, had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. HERBERT rose.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois has precedence over the order of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

Mr. HERBERT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 7635) to consolidate certain bureaus of the Navy Department, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. That motion can not be made while the other motion is pending. The only way to reach that is to refuse to agree to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, which has precedence under the rule. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 94, noes 28.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10397) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now ask the Clerk to read so much of the report as relates to the bill.

The Clerk read from the report (by Mr. TOWNSHEND) as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, in presenting the bill making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the fiscal year 1888, submit the following in explanation thereof:

The estimates upon which the bill is based will be found on page 153 of the Book of Estimates for 1888, and amount to $76,252,500.

The accompanying bill appropriates $76,247,500, apportioned as follows:

For the payment of pensions	$75,000,000
For fees and expenses of examining surgeons	1,000,000
For salaries of pension agents	72,000
For clerk-hire	150,000
For rents	15,000
For fuel	750
For lights	750
For stationery and incidentals	9,000

The amount for payment of pensions is the same as was appropriated for 1887.

The amount for examining surgeons is increased $179,000 over the sum given for the current year, and the appropriation is limited to payment for services rendered within the fiscal year 1888.

The salaries of pension agents is fixed by law; consequently no change is made in the amount for their compensation as compared with the sum given for 1887.

The amount recommended for rents is reduced from $20,000 to $15,000, and the following provision is incorporated in the bill:

"And the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause suitable rooms to be set apart in the public buildings under his control in cities where pension agencies are located which shall be acceptable to the Secretary of the Interior, for the use and occupancy of the said agencies respectively."

The provisions of the bill are based upon existing law, and without regard to any legislation that may hereafter be enacted.

REFERENCES.

Section 4755 of the Revised Statutes provides that Navy pensions shall be paid out of the "Navy pension fund," upon an appropriation by Congress, so far as the same may be sufficient.

The naval pension fund at present amounts to $14,000,000, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, and is created under the provisions of sections 4751 and 4752 of the Revised Statutes.

The payments on account of Navy pensions during the fiscal year 1886 aggregated $813,449.51.

The compensation of pension agents is fixed by the act of June 14, 1878 (Supplement to the Revised Statutes, pp. 347 and 348), by the act of July 4, 1884, and by the act of March 3, 1885 (Statutes at Large, vol. 23, pp. 99 and 362).

The compensation of examining surgeons is fixed at $2 for each examination by section 4 of the act of July 25, 1882 (Statutes at Large, vol. 22, pp. 175 and 176), and the act of March 3, 1885 (Statutes at Large, vol. 23, p. 362).

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the reading of the remainder of the report be omitted, as it consists simply of tables, which do not explain the character of the bill or throw any light directly upon its provisions. I have no remarks to make, and unless there be a desire for debate, or unless some gentleman wishes further explanation of the bill, I will ask that the Clerk proceed to read it by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the committee will proceed to consider the bill under the five-minute rule.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was accordingly read and considered by sections.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise and report this bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10397) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes; and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPRINT OF A REPORT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, asks consent to have reprinted a report made by that committee on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, because of errors in the original print.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of further considering the special order, the bill to consolidate certain bureaus of the Navy Department.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. HERBERT; and there were—ayes 83, noes 51.

Mr. BOUTELLE. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE].

Mr. HERBERT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 133, nays 77, not voting 109; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. HERBERT was agreed to.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. HIESTAND, on this vote.

Mr. MATSON with Mr. CONGER, for the remainder of the week.

Mr. RANDALL with Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, on this vote. Mr. RANDALL would vote "aye" and Mr. HENDERSON "no."

The following named members were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. JONES, of Alabama, with Mr. WAIT.

Mr. MAHONEY with Mr. PIRCE.

Mr. WALLACE with Mr. RICE.

Mr. MITCHELL with Mr. WHITING.

Mr. GLOVER with Mr. WARNER, of Missouri.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas, with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont.

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. WEST.

Mr. CANDLER with Mr. MILLARD.

Mr. BYNUM with Mr. LITTLE.

Mr. DUNHAM with Mr. COLLINS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, with Mr. GALLINGER.

Mr. KING with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. GILFILLAN.

Mr. BALLENTINE with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois.

Mr. BLANCHARD with Mr. STEPHENSON.

Mr. SKINNER with Mr. DORSEY.

Mr. LAWLER with Mr. STEELE.

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR with Mr. PAYSON.

Mr. COX, of New York, with Mr. CANNON.

The following named members were announced as paired for this day:

Mr. MILLER with Mr. GUENTHER.

Mr. SENEY with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. NORWOOD with Mr. DAVENPORT.

Mr. SOWDEN with Mr. BURLEIGH.

Mr. DARGAN with Mr. BUNNELL.

Mr. DAWSON with Mr. MORRILL.

Mr. MAYBURY with Mr. HISCOCK.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

CONSOLIDATION OF NAVY DEPARTMENT BUREAUS.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7635) to consolidate certain bureaus of the Department of the Navy, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HERBERT. If the gentleman from Texas will yield a moment, I desire to see whether we can make some arrangement with gentlemen opposing this bill as to the limit of time for general debate. I would like to know how long they want for discussion on their side.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that we ought not to begin to talk about limiting the time for discussion when this bill has only been read. Here is a proposition to reorganize one of the great Departments of this Government, and it is very strange that the gentleman from Alabama should urge at the very outset a limitation of the debate. I think the debate ought to go on until we can form some judgment as to how much discussion is necessary.

Mr. HERBERT. Well, let it go on. I supposed gentlemen on the other side would not consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration has for its object the promotion of an economical, harmonious, and successful administration of the Naval Department. It is not a political measure. As now constituted it can not be doubted there exists, and has existed for years, in this particular branch of the military service a want of responsibility and unity of action among those charged with the most important functions, producing great and unnecessary extravagance and resulting in an almost total incapacity to accomplish any valuable and extensive work.

The proceedings of Congress and the records of the Department disclose the appropriation and expenditure of enormous sums of money for the repair of vessels and for the maintenance of the navy-yards. Yet we find ourselves to-day without a navy worthy of the name and without a single yard in a commendable condition.

It will be unnecessary for me, Mr. Chairman, to consume the time of the committee in adducing evidence as to the present disgraceful and unparalleled worthlessness of our fleet, either for defensive or offensive purposes. The reports of the Admiral, made and published time and again, inform us that our vessels of war can scarcely perform the duties of a peace establishment, and, in case of hostilities, would have to abandon the high seas altogether until peace should be restored.

The miserable and dilapidated condition of our yards and stations corresponds—alas, too well—with the feebleness and decrepitude of our vessels and amply sustains the report of the Chief of Bureau of Yards and Docks, in which we find the following passage:

Your attention was called to this condition of affairs last year in the statement made by me in my annual report, which I now beg leave to repeat:

"Scarcely a week has passed since I assumed control of this bureau that reports have not been received of buildings tumbling down, or liable to do so at any moment, roofs leaking to such an extent as to involve destruction of property, wharves rotting and falling into the water, and others so defective that they can not be used, water service defective on account of worn-out pipes, and a complaint of decay that implies general destruction."

When, Mr. Chairman, we consider the vast expenditures which have been made in the construction and repair of our ships and of the buildings, docks, wharves, and machinery in our yards, we can not, however much we might desire, escape the conclusion that very serious, if not criminal, blunders have been committed in the management of our naval affairs.

From the most reliable and authentic sources we are advised that the vessels which constituted our Navy at the conclusion of the last fiscal year, and were then completed, had been built and repaired at a cost to the Government of $76,593,360.47, of which sum $40,300,176.33 was expended for repairs.

Now, to this expenditure upon vessels add the total cost of permanent improvements and repairs, including the sites at the yards, from their establishment to June 30, 1886, which was—

Portsmouth	$4,371,387 18
Boston	7,434,853 42
New York	11,859,948 29
League Island	1,760,248 94
Washington	4,396,171 81
Norfolk	7,881,013 69
Mare Island	9,090,294 84
Pensacola	6,337,310 18
Philadelphia (old yard)	2,954,175 43
Total	56,085,403 78

And we have for the total of such expenditures at the date stated the enormous sum of $132,678,764.25.

Contrast this vast amount of money with the results it has accomplished as manifested in the reports of the Admiral of the Navy and of the Chief of Bureau of Yards and Docks, and accept the lesson which the comparison teaches and with all the responsibility it imposes.

It will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that I have called the attention of the committee to the cost of the construction and repair of such ships only as were comprised in our naval establishment at the close of the last fiscal year. If I had also taken into account the expenditures upon such vessels as have gone out of commission and have been condemned and sold since the termination of the late civil war, and considering only the cost of the repairs made on such vessels since June 30, 1868, the sum total of disbursements would have been very largely increased.

But it occurs to me that enough, and more than enough, has been shown to justify the fixed conclusion in every unprejudiced mind that the administration of the Navy Department has not been conducted in the interest of economy and efficiency.

It behooves us then, as the representatives of the people, upon the great majority of whom the burdens of this Government are now resting with an exceedingly oppressive weight, and as legislators professing anxiety to inaugurate all needful reforms, to earnestly seek after the true cause of the evil and to apply such remedial measures as will give immediate and permanent relief. I do not believe that the fault lies with the personnel of the Navy. Its officers are gentlemen of integrity, skill, experience, courage, and patriotism. They are devoted to their profession and are the peers of any who are performing similar duties in other countries and under other flags. Beyond all question they are worthy the high reputation which they enjoy both at home and abroad. The honor and safety of the country is secure in their hands, provided only they be furnished with the proper implements of war. But if the personnel of the Navy be not justly responsible for the sad condition of our war-vessels and naval workshops, whither are we to look in order to ascertain the source from which has sprung such an unfortunate administration as has characterized the management of this Department of the Government?

Turning to the annual report of ex-Secretary Chandler for 1883, we find him asserting in strong and vigorous language the pressing necessity of a radical reform in the method under which the navy-yards were being operated—complaining of the great and insurmountable difficulties experienced by him in attempting such reforms in consequence of the opposition of persons interested in the existing system, and recommending that Congress should quickly interpose and accord him effective assistance in the shape of specific legislation upon the subject.

Says Mr. Chandler, in the same report, the arguments and facts which show that reforms should be instituted are overwhelming.

And what picture could be more striking or be better calculated to arrest and to challenge the attention of the most careless observer, than the one drawn by the same official in his report, made a year later, respecting the administration of the navy-yards? It is from the pencil of a master, made so by a thorough and personal acquaintance with the practical operation of the bureau system, as then and as now constituted. The ex-Secretary has thus recorded himself:

The most perplexing question in the reconstruction of the Navy will be the disposition and management of the navy-yards, each having numerous workshops, and each workshop being engaged in producing or refitting separate portions of every one of the naval vessels constructed or repaired, while there are many heads of the work and no one technical superintendent responsible for and supervising the whole.

* * * * * * *

Too many persons are in form or in fact connected with the work; too much routine and formality exist; promptness of decision and action does not prevail; and responsibility for neglect, delays, or failures can not be definitely fixed.

* * * * * * *

At the present time navy-yard administration is overloaded with traditions and customs, the work is obstructed by a cumbrous organization, technical responsibility is lost in the elaborately graded multitude of semi-technical and semi-military officials; instead of smoothness is to be found friction; instead of promptness, delay and procrastination; instead of thrift, extravagance; instead of unity of action, a mass of discordant interests.

* * * * * * *

This reform is believed to be practicable and necessary. If the force of accumulated traditions and the excessive conservatism of the service prevent its adoption, it would be better to discontinue our yards for all working purposes, and not only build but repair our vessels and engines by contract.

Admiral Porter, whose skill, experience, and disinterestedness will be readily acknowledged by all, addressing the present Secretary, tells him—

Ever since you assumed charge of the Navy Department you must have perceived the necessity of reorganizing the whole Navy.

* * * * * * *

The Navy has been allowed for years to run in a rut, and not even a formidable war could eliminate the defects from the bureau system.

* * * * * * *

No objection can be made to most of the officers who have served as chiefs of bureaus; the fault is in the system.

The personnel of the Navy Department is sufficient to conduct the affairs of half a dozen navies if it were properly organized.

And, again the same high authroity, speaking upon the same question, expresses himself thus:

I beg leave to refer to a subject in which I believe you are warmly interested, and to which you have given considerable attention—that is, the reorganization of the different branches of the Navy, and especially the Navy Department.

I think the opinion is general throughout the service that until the Department is reorganized we can have no system, maintain no proper discipline, and build no effective ships; but that a reorganization of the Department will bring order out of chaos, and the Navy will run along as smoothly as it did previous to 1842, when the board of Navy commissioners were the advisers of the Secretary of the Navy and had administrative and executive authority.

This reorganization must take place sooner or later, and whoever achieves so great a victory will deserve the thanks of the country.

I have seen the workings of both systems—the old and the present—and, with no prejudices whatever in the matter, I have for the past twenty-five years strenuously advocated a change for reasons which, as they appear in most of my previous annual reports to the Department, it is unnecessary to repeat.

I think we should adopt a system in the Department somewhat similar to the British board of admiralty, the Secretary of the Navy to be the political, judicial, and financial head of the Navy, holding somewhat the relation to a board of control that the first lord of the admiralty does to the board of admiralty.

The bureau system, under proper restrictions, has many good points, but it is insufficient in its present condition to build up an effective navy or carry on war.

There should be a change in the number of bureaus. That of provisions and clothing should be merged into a bureau of accounts and purchases, to purchase everything required for the Navy and settle all accounts of the various bureaus and departments of the service, placing them in final shape for presentation to the Fourth Auditor. The name of the proposed bureau will indicate its duties.

There should be a single bureau of construction, steam engineering, and repair, under one head. This would prevent the caviling which has heretofore existed in regard to the placing of engines, masts, &c., and would make one person responsible for any mistakes committed in the construction and repair of ships and machinery.

This simple change in the bureau system could be easily brought about without friction, and the necessary changes made in the detail of the bureaus would naturally be indicated by the nature of the work to be accomplished.

In consequence, Mr. Chairman, of the repeated and urgent recommendations of ex-Secretary Chandler to take some action in the premises, Congress, in 1882, directed the appointment of a commission to investigate the navy-yard management. The commission was organized with Commodore S. B. Luce, Chief Engineer Charles H. Loring, and A. B. Mullett, a civilian, as members. These gentlemen, after a thorough and exhaustive inquiry into the evils so often and vigorously complained of, reported their conclusions, among which was the following:

The third query invites an expression of our views as to whether "any improvements can be made in the system of performing work at the navy-yards which will promote efficiency and reduce expenses."

In the memorandum already referred to an attempt was made in the direction implied by this inquiry. The scheme for the reorganization of the working force of our navy-yards, as contained in that paper, was the best that could be devised under the circumstances; it was a step toward a concentration of forces and economy and dispatch in the method of doing work. It was submitted in the belief that a fair trial would soon develop whatever was impracticable and lead to proper amendment, and that in a short time the new system would adjust itself so as to run smoothly, as it certainly would economically.

To a proper understanding of the subject, it should be stated, that the present wasteful extravagance in employing so great an excess of non-producers, and the inefficient system of doing business which has for years past been steadily increasing in our navy-yards, is but the natural outgrowth of the constitution of the Navy Department itself. There can be no manner of doubt of this. Each navy-yard is made up of a number of separate and comparatively independent establishments, little principalities, as it were, each owing allegiance to its own sovereign, the chief of the bureau to which it belongs. The heads of departments of a navy-yard have extensive and responsible duties and a large patronage, and are naturally jealous of the interference of any one but their own chiefs.

Thus each department has been gradually building itself up so as to be independent of all other departments, and is constantly striving to do all its own work. Each of the principal departments has its own body of artisans, its own machinery, its own steam generators, and its own peculiar method of doing business. As an illustration, we take from official "schedule of wages" (Form 9) of civil engineer's office the following ratings: Boiler-makers, boiler-makers' helper, calkers, coopers, cabinet-makers, core-makers, ship-joiners, ship-carpenters, machinists, machinists' helpers, molders, oakum-pickers, and pattern-makers—a little ship-yard in itself.

In this way it has come that some of our yards are filled up with machinery far beyond their actual needs, and it is no exaggeration to say that there is to-day enough machinery of various kinds in either the New York or Boston yard to do the work of its own particular class of the entire Navy during peace. We habitually speak of a private ship-yard as a "plant," but each of our national ship-yards is a segregation of "plants," each having its own separate organization, and each its own internal regulations. Many illustrations might be given to show how, through the want of concert of action among these several "plants," useless and vexatious delays occur, to say nothing of the waste of time and of public money due to such diffusion.

To make such radical changes as we proposed in our memorandum was no easy task, nor did we expect that they could be effected without considerable friction, not to say opposition; but supposing the changes to be made on the basis laid down by the commission, it is hardly to be hoped that under present conditions they will be permanent. For whatever changes may be introduced now, and how beneficial soever they may be, still the same causes remaining in active operation must inevitably produce the same results, and in time restore the system of independent plants, with all its attendant evils. Hence we conclude that to organize our navy-yards on a just and permanent basis, to consolidate their several plants, to introduce thrift in the management and promptness in the methods of doing work, with a proper system of accountability; to secure, in short, in each of our yards unification, economy, and dispatch, with an administration of its affairs agreeable to the principles of business as understood in civil life, it is absolutely necessary to begin within the Navy Department itself.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, additional and better evidence will not be deemed necessary in order to establish, beyond all cavil, the fact that the true and the only cause of the failure of the Naval Department to accomplish results proportionate to the extraordinarily large expenditures with which it stands charged lies in the want of a proper administrative organization—the practical operation of which sets at defiance every well-known and generally-accepted principle and policy of successful private enterprise.

As is well known, the administration is subdivided into eight bureaus, each of which is organized independently of the others. From 1842 to 1862 there existed only four of these bureaus—Yards and Docks, Construction, Equipment and Repair, Medicine and Surgery, Provisions and Clothing. This organization was changed at the latter date, and additional bureaus were formed and the duties differently divided, as follows: Yards and Docks, Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, Equipment and Recruiting, Navigation, Ordnance, Provisions and Clothing, Medicine and Surgery.

This is also the present organization. The story comes down to us that the chiefs of these bureaus got together one day in 1867 and, over their walnuts and wine, apportioned out to themselves, with the consent of the then Secretary, the entire power of the Department, so that each might have one of his own, with clerks, writers, messengers, telegraph operators, and every other kind of employé that might be necessary to the dignity and respectability of the bureau system. Thus, using the language of the commission of 1882, each navy-yard became made up of a number of separate and comparatively independent establishments, little principalities as it were, each owing allegiance to its own sovereign, the chief of the bureau to which it belonged.

One, however superficial, can readily perceive that this division of authority among officials, independent of one another, could not but beget discord, irresponsibility, extravagance, and failure, Out of so incoherent and unnatural a connection of independent authorities no good thing could possibly come. Eight petty monarchs in every navy-yard—each one vain of his own authority and jealous of the importance of others; resentful of every attempted encroachment upon his jurisdiction; and expending the revenues, allowed him by law, with reckless prodigality—were too powerful for even so strong a Secretary as Mr. Chandler in his attempt to correct the evils and to reform the abuses that characterized the administration of the Naval Department during his term of office.

Mr. Chandler failed in the attempt, and so will every other Secretary fail unless Congress aid him with appropriate and specific legislation.

To illustrate, Mr. Chairman, the mischievous operation of the bureau system I beg to call the attention of the committee to certain portions of the annual report of the present Secretary.

Says he, in his communication of 1885 to the President:

> For the security of the public it is provided by law that the purchases at the Navy Department shall be by contract, after advertisement, and shall go to the lowest bidder; that only "regular dealers" shall be dealt with by the Department, which has been interpreted to mean persons whose occupation it is to deal in such articles with the general public. The contract system can be dispensed with only when there is an emergency certified to by the bureau officer for the immediate purchase, doubtless largely intended for a time of war.
> The open purchases of the Navy Department for the year ending June 30, 1885, amounted to $841,285.84, while the purchases by contract amounted to only a little over a million. A large proportion of the open purchases consisted of articles of either comparatively small value or more or less difficult of classification; but $138,000 of the amount was spent by the seven bureaus, each acting independently of the other, for coal bought, not in one lot, but at 166 several open purchases (this does not include coal bought by ships on foreign stations); 299 different open purchases of stationery were made by eight different bureaus; $121,315.66 was spent for lumber and hardware by six bureaus in 499 separate open purchases. Seven bureaus spent $46,000 for oils and paints in 269 separate purchases; 117 different open purchases of iron and steel were made at an expense of $41,524.48; $68,881.59 was spent for hemp and cordage in 45 different open purchases. Eight bureaus supply stationery to ships; three bureaus supply ships with lamps and lanterns. To the same ship one bureau supplies electric lights and the light for general illuminating purposes; another supplies electric search lights, and a third oil and light for the engine and fire rooms.
> These facts are taken from the records of the year ending June 30, 1885, and its showing is more favorable than that for the previous year.
> Illustrations of a rather extraordinary character of the resort to this certificate of necessity for immediate purchases as a convenience appear among these records.
> In the summer of 1883 an order was given for $61,000 worth of canvas to a person who was not a dealer in the article, and at a time when there was the usual supply of canvas on hand.
> Under an order made by Secretary Thompson in 1877 it was understood that the limit of any single purchase under a "certificate of necessity" was $500. For purchases involving a larger amount resort must be had to the ordinary contract system. Several months were consumed in the delivery of this $61,000 worth of canvas, and the bills were made out in sums of less than $500 each. The "certificate of necessity" accompanied each one, and in that form the bills passed the Treasury Department.
> Two or three of these bills, with the bureau officer's certificate of necessity upon them, would sometimes be dated and presented on the same day.
> During the same year coal was purchased by different paymasters from the same person on or about the same days, deliverable at the very same place, of like quality and character, but at prices differing from 50 to 65 cents a ton.

And speaking of the Bureaus of Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, Equipment and Recruiting, and Ordnance he says:

> Take the Omaha for an example. She has been rebuilt within the last four years, at an expense of $572,000. It was an act of the greatest folly. She is a repaired wooden vessel, with boilers, machinery, and guns, all of which would at the time have been sold for what they would have brought by any other nation on earth. In the event of a war she can neither fight nor run away from any cruiser built contemporaneously by any other nation. Her rebuilding cost the full price of a modern steel ship of her size and all modern characteristics.
> Now, if one should seek to ascertain who is responsible for the decision that the Omaha should be rebuilt, it would be found that no one so decided after discussion and an intelligent knowledge of facts. The chief constructor will deny responsibility except for the survey; the engineer-in-chief the same; and the Secretary of the Navy, if he should be able to recall the circumstances, would doubtless remember that he was advised that she needed general repairs and rebuilding, and gave the orders in ignorance of the probable result of his decision.
> At present the four heads of these bureaus, instead of co-operating, work independently of each other and not always in harmony in producing their respective parts of a completed ship. After the Omaha had been commissioned and was ready for sea, it appeared that the several bureaus working independently upon her, had between them so completely appropriated her space that they had left her coal room for not more than four days' steaming at her full capacity. Each bureau, too, finds it necessary to maintain its separate shops in the several navy-yards, each with a separate organization of foremen, quartermen, leading men, &c., so that shops doing precisely the same class of work—carpenter-shops and machine-shops, for instance, are commonly duplicated and sometimes triplicated in the same navy-yard with a corresponding multiplicity of foremen and organization expenses—a state of things which, under the present organization of the Department, it is almost impossible to correct.

Having constituted a board to take an inventory of all the stores and material at the several navy-yards and stations, the Secretary, in his report of 1886, refers to its action in this wise:

> The inventory shows a very large and unnecessary accumulation of stores and supplies by the different bureaus, aggregating over $20,000,000 in appraised value. The board reports between three and four millions in value to be obsolete and useless at the present time, only entailing expense for keepers and constant care to preserve them in condition. Among these accumulations some very absurd facts appear. At the eight navy-yards there have accumulated altogether of augurs and bits 46,566, of which 25,274 have been lying for several years at closed yards where no work has been or is likely to be done. Twenty-nine thousand five hundred and forty-two gross of screws are on hand, 10,896 gross lying at closed yards. There are 146,385 files in stock, 42,142 of them lying at closed yards. There are 11,813 paint-brushes in stock, 2,246 of these in the stores at closed yards. All of these tools are serviceable, mostly new.
> [There are found to be over 12,000 tons of cast and wrought iron lying in scrap about the yards, 759,000 pounds of composition and brass, 159,000 pounds of old copper, and 193,000 of old lead.]
> Of most of these articles some bureaus have recently made considerable purchases, and are even doing so at the present time, while to the credit of other bureaus there are very large amounts in stock. Captain Meade, president of the inventory board, says:
> "In going through one of the yards where the construction department was short of cut nails, the storehouse in charge of steam engineering was found filled from floor to ceiling with barrels on barrels of the needed nails. I asked the officer in charge how long at his present rate of expenditure it would take to use up those nails that construction and repair so badly needed; and he replied, 'Well, sir, I think about fifty years.'"
> These stores of tools or machinery are periodically oiled or painted; in the mean time require large storage room, a force of watchmen, &c., and are constantly becoming obsolete and useless. The expenditure entailed in a series of years exceeds in all probability the value of the property.

Mr. Chairman, when the Committee on Naval Affairs were taking testimony relative to the reorganization of the Department, Mr. HEWITT, at that time a member of the committee, whose reputation for ability, experience, and general and varied information is second to that of no member of this House, in a statement made by him to the committee, said:

> By way of illustrating this point further, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that in the repair of a certain vessel at the Norfolk navy-yard, for instance, it was found that the hull was repaired on certain dimensions agreed upon at the time by the construction department; the boilers and machinery were constructed on certain dimensions, and at the time agreed upon by the steam-engineering department; the rigging and spars were agreed upon by the heads of that department, and when they came to get the whole machinery together the boilers would not go in, they would not fit, because there had been no consultation between the heads of the department, or supervision by the Secretary compelling them to agree upon all the different points, and so when they came to put them together it was found that they would not fit.

Also—

I know that in the case of the Pinta the error I mentioned occurred, and I remember another vessel, the name of which I can not recall, but which I can furnish if necessary, where the vessel was condemned because her machinery was so much out of proportion that it could not be got into her.

And Commodore Harmony, before the same committee, stated:

But until 1867 we had a single storekeeper, through whom everything was issued. The navy agent first purchased, and he received the purchases; he received everything, and everything was delivered through him. It was a very good system, and carried us through the war without trouble; and I think it now could be returned to with great profit. In all navy-yards each storekeeper has as many clerks as the one storekeeper we had during the war had. There are eight storekeepers in each of the navy-yards, because each bureau has control of its own stores. I might call attention here to one instance to show how it has grown by referring to a single building opposite the commandant's office in New York, covering at least 6,000 square feet of ground, and three and a half stories. That was the storehouse built for all the Departments in 1867, but that building has finally come down to be the storehouse of one bureau, with perhaps a little room in a corner for some other officer. During the war we had a three-story building that I don't think covered more than 4,000 square feet, and out of that all the ships in the service were supplied; but in 1867 these matters were divided into these different bureaus, and each bureau was made independent of the other as to its storekeeper.

Q. Where there are eight storekeepers are there eight separate store-rooms?

A. Oh, yes; and it is not a small store-room, but each department has a building. As I say, there is one building of 6,000 square feet at least that is used as a store-house for one department.

Q. Then, in the present age, when things have so changed in relation to the building of ships, if we had the old system of one storekeeper for all the yards we would require as many buildings as now, would we?

A. No, sir. I think at the New York navy-yard, which is the principal one, that the one store-house now used by one department would be more than ample for the whole.

Q. And the other store-rooms might be utilized for other purposes?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, then, there is that other bureau this bill proposes to establish—supplies and accounts?

A. I was referring to that in connection with the storekeeper duties.

Q. What do you think of that?

A. That is what I referred to in that connection. I think it is absolutely necessary the thing should be done, because now we have a multitude of clerks, to such an enormous extent in the different bureaus, each of which is independent of the others, and buying its own stores and keeping its own accounts. It simply seems to be absurd. No mercantile or manufacturing establishment could be carried on six months under the system that we have now in the Navy.

Q. Do you think the adoption of the system proposed by the bill could be properly carried out with any considerable saving to the navy-yards?

A. I do not see how it could be otherwise. Possibly experience may show that I am in error.

Q. You said there were eight different storekeepers of divisions?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. If the stores were consolidated, how many storekeepers would be needed?

A. One, under an efficient officer.

Q. How much could the force of clerks, &c., be reduced?

A. I should say about one-sixth of the present number.

By Mr. SAYERS:

Q. Do you mean to say one-sixth of the present number?

A. Yes, sir; that involves a store clerk and an assistant and a laborer—a store laborer who generally does writing, and another store laborer who generally takes care of the things in the store; that is about forty-two people, and I think six people could do it. I only judge by what was my experience during the war, and how we did it in a single store-house in the New York navy-yard.

Also:

We know ships have been built and engines constructed and ordnance designed, and when the three were put together it was found that they did not fit; and there is where the difficulty comes. In one case parts of a ship had to be cut away to get in the boilers, and ports had to be changed to put the guns in proper place and give them sufficient room to work, simply because the three persons who had control of the matter did not confer together; they were acting independently. I have seen that occur in the navy-yard; I have seen it in a case of ordnance, and I know in steam engineering and construction, where the three persons who had control of the essential parts of the ships, without conference, went on in their own way, and afterward each found the others had not worked with him in accordance with his plans, and things had to be changed in consequence. I think you will find that the case in some of these new ships.

Mr. REED, of Maine. What was the bill there referred to, this bill at present under consideration or the previous one?

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to the gentleman from Maine the question and the answer which I have read applied as well to the bill under consideration as to the previous bill.

Mr. REED, of Maine. To which was the statement intended to apply?

Mr. SAYERS. It was intended at the time to apply to the previous one.

Mr. REED, of Maine. To the previous bill, which is quite different from this one?

Mr. SAYERS. Not in this respect. There is no difference in the two bills as regards the subject-matter of the statement I have just read.

It would seem that the administration of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery should, from the very nature of its appropriate duties, be entirely free from complication; yet we find that if a man be sick he is transported to a hospital at the expense of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, but if he be insane the cost of his transportation must be borne by the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery. And if the sick man be taken to a hospital outside of the United States the charge for his transportation and for his maintenance at the hospital falls upon the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery. The patient recovering, he returns to his ship at the cost of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting; but dying, his funeral expenses are defrayed by the Secretary of the Navy.

There is a certain grim humor in all this. From the very moment the poor fellow entered into the service until life departed from his exhausted body, the chiefs of bureaus, each in his turn, maintained with jealous care exclusive jurisdiction over him. The instant, however, that he ceases to breathe they turn coldly and carelessly away from his lifeless remains. But dead he is more honored than when living.

A Cabinet officer pauses a while from the duties of his exalted station and gives to the neglected body an appropriate burial.

Mr. REED, of Maine. What is to prevent the Secretary from changing all those things of his own motion? Why should he permit such absurdities?

Mr. SAYERS. I will answer the gentleman from Maine in the language of ex-Secretary Chandler, a man who served with ability in the Navy Department for full four years and who may be presumed to have known what he was talking about. Mr. Chandler in his report for 1883 uses this language:

Much difficulty has been experienced in effecting navy-yard reforms owing to the opposition of persons interested in the existing system, not only to closing the repair shops in yards to be hereafter kept only as naval stations and arsenals, but also as to concentration and economy at yards which are to be kept open for work. The specific directions of Congress should therefore be sought and effectively accorded. The arguments and facts which show that reforms should be instituted are overwhelming.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What reform is referred to there by Secretary Chandler?

Mr. SAYERS. Reform in the Navy Department from top to bottom and from side to side.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Did Secretary Chandler demand that?

Mr. SAYERS. Reform everywhere is what Secretary Chandler demanded.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is my colleague on the committee [Mr. SAYERS] now quoting Secretary Chandler or the gentleman from Texas himself?

Mr. SAYERS. I was quoting the language of Secretary Chandler when I read it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do you say that he said the Department should be reorganized?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir. I will get through with that directly and will come to a higher authority than Secretary Chandler.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But I am very much interested now in Secretary Chandler's authority. I want to find out where those quotation marks come in.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to consume the time to which I am entitled in bandying words with the gentleman from Maine. Here are the reports, and if during the four or six years the gentleman from Maine has been a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs he had paid proper attention to his duties he would now be as well posted as myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED, of Maine. Still, if it is not disturbing my friend from Texas too much, I do not see how his quotation from Secretary Chandler answers my question about these refusals to pay the transportation of sailors under different circumstances.

Mr. SAYERS. I am not responsible, Mr. Chairman, for the gentleman's failure to understand the answer.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Perhaps the gentleman from Texas will explain, and sort of approach the things to each other.

Mr. SAYERS. I will do it in my own good time.

Mr. REED, of Maine. It may be a good way or it may not. That remains to be seen.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], one of the members of the Naval Committee, propounded an interrogatory to Commodore Harmony, and was answered as I now read:

Question. Do you know of any reason why the present Secretary, with the hearty co-operation which I assume he would command from the present heads of bureaus, would be unable to rectify these things?

A. Yes, sir; I can put it in this way: It is a very hard thing to break up a system that has obtained for so long, and there are so many people accustomed to it that do not want a change. That is our condition.

Q. But there is no insuperable obstacle in the way?

A. Not that I know of. But here are these separate bureaus, which have control of their own money, and that of itself stops the Secretary. The Secretary has not absolute control of one penny that is appropriated.

And, Mr. Chairman, right here I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that year after year Congress has been appropriating specific sums to each of these bureaus, and that over the money so appropriated the Secretary has not the slightest control. He can not order the transfer of money from one bureau to another, for Congress provides that the money shall be committed, in each case, to the custody of the chief of the particular bureau. That is one of the reasons why it is impossible for the Secretary to require, when a sick man or an insane man has to be carried to the hospital, that his transportation shall be paid by any particular bureau. It is also a reason why, when a man dies, none of these bureaus will take charge of his remains, but will turn him over to the custody of the Secretary of the Navy himself. The bureaus, as now constituted, are independent, in great measure, of one another and also of the Secretary. As their warrant of authority and jurisdiction they point to the act of Congress which organized our present bureau system in 1862.

Mr. GOFF. In 1842, you mean.

Mr. SAYERS. No; 1862. In 1842 a law was enacted providing for five bureaus. But in 1862 another act was passed constituting eight bureaus instead of five. And they do not want to yield. That is the reason there was found upon every desk in this House a written memorial against the passage of this bill.

Mr. GOFF. It was the adoption of the system to which I alluded, not the additions to it. I say the system was adopted in 1842; I understood the gentleman to say it was adopted in 1862.

Mr. SAYERS. I said the present bureaus were established in 1862.

Mr. GOFF. The additions were made in 1862, but the system was adopted in 1842.

Mr. SAYERS. The history of the Naval Department, Mr. Chairman, for the past twenty years is full to the overflowing of instances of unpardonable extravagance, irreconcilable discord, and fatal irresponsibility, resulting in a great measure from the unwise constitution of the present bureau system. Its baneful effects may be plainly seen, as I have before said, as well in the utter worthlessness of our war vessels as in the deplorable condition of our yards, and we have it from the highest and most trustworthy of living authorities, Admiral Porter, that we can have no system, maintain no proper discipline, and build no effective ships until the Department is reorganized.

This reorganization, if it is to be of any value whatever, must have for its controlling features the principles of unity of action and responsibility; and the subdivisions of work that is to result must be upon those lines which have been long since and plainly established by the great and successful business concerns of the country in the management of their own affairs; and, in addition to these essential requisites, the Secretary must be supplied with the means that will enable him to act promptly, decisively, and wisely upon all questions submitted him.

The bill under consideration, Mr. Chairman, is a substantial compliance with such form of organization. It has been carefully considered and matured, and the Committee on Naval Affairs confidently submit it to the House as a practical and needful measure of reform. In every essential particular it meets the demands of the hour, and is a suitable response to the many and pressing calls, made by those responsible for the proper administration of the Naval Department, upon Congress for such specific legislation as would enable them to repress abuses, restore efficiency, promote economy, and induce harmony in this important branch of the military service.

It begins with the distribution of the business of the Department among five bureaus—Navigation, Ordnance, Medicine and Surgery, Material, Construction, and Repair, Supplies and Accounts.

The Bureau of Material, Construction, and Repair is made to contain two divisions—construction and equipment and steam-engineering. If I have not been misinformed, Mr. Chairman, it is against this particular feature of the measure that the greatest, if not the only, objection will be urged. It is, indeed, a most important provision and is expected to accomplish the most favorable results if the bill should become a law. It has the support of not only a large majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs but also of two Secretaries of the Navy, of the Admiral, and of the chiefs of several bureaus as now constituted.

Mr. Chandler, in his annual report of 1883, expresses himself with much emphasis as to the policy of uniting the Bureaus of Construction and Repair and of Steam-Engineering. The language used by him is too plain to be misunderstood. Says he:

It is, however, beyond dispute that methods of naval construction must change with the transition from wooden to steel vessels. It will be found impossible for two independent and equal bureau chiefs to design and supervise the construction of a modern vessel, the one that of the hull and the other that of the machinery and bring all parts together in one perfect ship without differences of opinion which can not longer be safely decided by a common superior who does not possess technical skill. The true solution of the conflict is to unite these two bureaus as a single bureau of naval construction, having for its chief the most competent naval architect that can be found, whether among the present officers of the Navy or in civil life.

And in his report of 1884:

It is again recommended that the two Bureaus of Construction and Repair and Steam-Engineering be united as a single bureau of naval construction, to have for its chief the most competent naval architect who can be found, whether among the present officers of the Navy or in civil life; and it is further recommended that the equipment work be transferred from the present bureau to such enlarged bureau of construction.

And Commodore Walker, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, before the Naval Committee:

Q. Now, another question. The important function of this bureau—that is, the Bureau of Construction, Material, and Repair, as provided in this bill under these three subdivisions—do you know of any private concern, any manufacturing concern, organized on a large scale that has not been driven to precisely that principle of organization; that is to say, not provided with a superior head, commonly called the manager, to supervise the operations of the subordinates in his department?

A. That is the plan of organization in all large concerns of which I have knowledge, and the practical one.

Q. If you were to go into a private concern—a concern, if you will, for the building of steamships—and find that the proprietor, when you went to him on business, told you to go first to the man who had charge of the engines, and another man who had charge of the boilers, and another who had charge of the hulls, and you were to wander around in that way for information in regard to the ships and prices, would you not think such a concern badly organized?

A. Yes, sir; I should expect to find the information in the central office.

Q. With some one responsible?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You would expect to find with regard to the ship a place where every question could be answered as to every department of the ship?

A. Yes, sir; where it could be given at a glance.

Q. Of course when it came to minor questions you would expect the man in charge when he was in doubt to send out for the information from some of the subordinates?

A. Yes, sir; there would be minor details for which he would have to send to his subordinates, but all matters of consequence should be known at the central office and be available without difficulty.

Q. This bill is based upon the division of labor, first of the co-ordination of the results of this labor under one general head; is that generally regarded as a sound principle of carrying on large operations?

A. I think it is.

And Commodore Schley, Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting:

By Mr. BOUTELLE:

Q. Do you think the evils you point out—is it your idea that they require a statutory enactment to remove them?

A. I said a moment ago that the difficulties appear more functional than organic. The law which creates the present organization of the Navy Department places its business and its administration in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, so that if it fails it must be administrative rather than organic. I can see that the present organization is defective. There are three bureaus that should be brought into one; that is, the Bureau of Construction and Repair, of Engineering, and of Equipment. That is a reform that I would suggest. I would put these three together.

* * * * * * *

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You have stated that in your opinion Construction, Equipment, and Steam Engineering, which now constitute three separate bureaus, ought to be consolidated?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, will you state how that could be done under the present law?

A. It could not.

Q. You think, then, there ought to be a law authorizing that to be done?

A. I think so.

Q. Then your statement, if you said so, that the Secretary of the Navy has full power under the law as it exists to make such organization as he sees proper, must be qualified?

A. I did not make that statement. If I did, I did not intend to make any such statement.

Q. You do not think, then, that the Secretary has full power to make any such organization under the present law?

A. No, sir; he can not do it, unless enabled by an act of Congress to do so.

And Commodore Harmony, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks:

As to the bureau of material, construction, and repair, that involves the building of ships more particularly than anything else, and the necessity for one head where everything connected with the building of a ship should be concentrated must be so clear to the mind of any person who has had anything to do with the construction of great objects that there can not be the shadow of a doubt of its necessity. In former times, when the Bureau of Construction was organized, there was under the Bureau of Construction the designing and construction of ships under the supervision of the chief constructor; the equipment was also under that officer.

The opinions of Commodores Schley and Harmony, Mr. Chairman, are not only entitled to great consideration because of their ability, skill, and experience, but also because of the fact that if the pending measure should become a law the bureaus over which they preside will immediately cease to exist.

I will not read from the reports of the present Secretary, though they are able, exhaustive, and convincing as to the pressing necessity of consolidating the duties and functions of the Bureaus of Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Equipment and Recruiting under one head.

It will be seen that the committee have abundant and trustworthy authority for the proposition. In this particular we were not acting upon a fanciful theory, nor groping in the dark, nor relying upon our own unaided selves.

But there are sources, other and higher than those mentioned, from which we drew the information that induced the committee to recommend such action to the House. One of these sources is to be found in the recorded expression of the Admiral—an officer full of years and of honors, laboring to crown the achievements of a long and an active life with the restoration of the naval Department to its ancient efficiency, economy, and renown. Let me again read from his report.

Mr. LONG. Does he say what kind of reorganization?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir. These are his exact words:

There should be a change in the number of bureaus. That of Provisions and Clothing should be merged into a bureau of accounts and purchases, to purchase everything required for the Navy, and settle all accounts of the various bureaus and departments of the service, placing them in final shape for presentation to the Fourth Auditor. The name of the proposed bureau will indicate its duties.

There should be a single bureau of construction, steam engineering, and repair, under one head. This would prevent the caviling which has heretofore existed in regard to the placing of engines, masts, &c., and would make one person responsible for any mistakes committed in the construction and repair of ships and machinery.

The other source is the experience of nearly twenty years, from 1842 to 1860, during which time the Navy of the United States, although small as compared with other nations, had the best ships and guns afloat.

Under the organization of 1842, steam engineering and equipment and recruiting were embraced in construction and repair. Our ships were during those years unsurpassed for speed, for strength, and for those other qualities, which gave to the people of America the reputation of having the most efficient, if not the largest in point of numbers, navy in the world.

The necessity, Mr. Chairman, for concentration under one head of all the departments entering into the construction of a vessel is too obvious to require lengthy discussion, nor does it require a knowledge of naval architecture to appreciate the wisdom of such policy.

The frequent failures made in our vessels built in navy-yards during the past twenty years are, no doubt, due to the divided responsibility which has existed. The contractor designs the vessel and makes his calculations for placing the engines and boilers, and the distribution of the masts and sails; the engineer plans the engines, and in some cases it has occurred that when they are put together they do not fit, and failure is the result.

By placing these departments of construction, engineering, and equipment under one head, provision will be made when designing the vessels, under the control of the one chief of construction, who, being alone responsible, will see to it that there are no incongruities, but everything will be so designed that when the several parts shall have been completed there will be the most perfect harmony among them all.

So much, Mr. Chairman, for the character of the workmanship to result from the consolidation of these three bureaus. It will be unnecessary for me, I trust, to speak of the saving of expenditures if such a plan be adopted. In every yard each one of these departments has its own shops, material, implements, and employés, store-house and clerical force, the larger portion of which will be dispensed with if this bill should become a law.

Let us now briefly consider the second most important provision of the bill—the one creating the bureau of supplies and accounts.

I have already, Mr. Chairman, called the attention of the committee to the many and heavy purchases made by the several bureaus, from which it will be readily seen that the most wasteful extravagance has been committed in the unnecessary purchase of material and supplies. No regard whatever seems to have been paid to what was on hand. Each bureau seems to have vied with the others in the accumulation of supplies, evidently making it an especial point to have no surplus on hand at the end of the fiscal year. It will be gratifying, however, to know—using the language of Mr. Secretary Whitney—that useless expenditures have, in a large number of cases, been cut off; rings formed to get and control Department contracts have been broken up, and the work of the Department fallen into the hands of well known and established houses. The following is a statement of these expenditures, with the surplus or deficiencies at the end of each year:

Year.	Ordinary expenditures.	Surplus balance.	Deficiency.
1884	6,142,256 52	.....	149,935 75
1885	5,435,292 57	.....	105,942 65
1886	5,020,942 30	$380,125 19	.....

In this statement there are not included the pay of the Navy, expenses of the Marine Corps and Naval Academy, and objects specially appropriated for, which are controlled by statute.

The loose and extravagant plan upon which purchases have been heretofore conducted is well illustrated, as stated by the chairman of the Naval Committee [Mr. HERBERT], in the fact that there was at the commencement of the present administration in two bureaus canvass enough to serve our present Navy for thirteen years, but has become worthless; spectacle-irons or clews to last over fifty years; pea-jackets to last over fifty years, and monkey-jackets to last over five years; all of which were purchased in 1870, 1871, and 1872.

These purchases, at such short intervals and in such large quantities, demonstrate, beyond cavil, the absolute necessity for the establishment of a better system for obtaining stores and material for the Department.

I will, however, call the attention of the committee to the statement of Commodore Walker, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, that the policy of the pending measure in the creation of this particular bureau may be better understood:

Q. Take one example—railways for instance. Have you ever had any experience in railway service?
A. Yes, sir; I was an officer of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad for about two years at one time, and I was also engaged on what is now the Iowa division of that railway, but which was then the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad, for something less than a year.
Q. What position did you fill in these corporations?
A. On the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad I was secretary of the corporation.
Q. Had you occasion to study the mode of doing business of that corporation as secretary?
A. Yes, sir; I had a good deal to do with it.
Q. Allow me to ask you as to the methods of carrying on the business of such a corporation. That is to say, is it divided into bureaus or divisions very much of the nature which the Navy has got for the transaction of its business; is it subdivided into heads and into several departments?
A. Yes, sir; there are certain divisions for the various kinds of work.
Q. The repair and machine shops being under the superintendence of a master of machinery, I suppose, and so on?
A. The shops are under the superintendent of machinery.
Q. And the division of purchases and supplies is under one officer?
A. Purchases are made and supplies furnished through an officer called the purchasing agent.
Q. And if anything is required to be bought or sold—the two to go together—is that left to the discretion of the person in charge of the respective divisions, or does it go through the great division of purchase and supply?
A. It is all done through the purchasing officer.
Q. Now the accounting of these great corporations—of course it is an absolute necessity that every dollar received and every dollar expended shall be accounted for somewhere—is that left to the several divisions, or does it finally come to one grand division where all the accounts are kept?
A. That is all done under the general auditor of the company.
Q. So that if you want any information as to what has been done with any money received or expended you do not go to the various divisions, but go to the auditor's office and ask for the books?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Has any corresponding system been adopted by the Navy Department for carrying on its great work?
A. Not that I know of.
Q. And to-day if you wish to get any information as to what has been done with the Government's money you would have no place to go particularly, but would be compelled to go into the several bureaus to ascertain that information?
A. Yes, sir; you would have to go to the various bureaus and to the Secretary's office, and even into the Treasury Department.
Q. You would have to go to the different bureaus and to the Department and into the Treasury—you would have to go through all that detail?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Now, this organization in private concerns is, I suppose, the result of experience and necessity?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Could the business of a great corporation like the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad or the Pennsylvania Company—which I regard as the perfection of human organization—could that business go on without infinite confusion and damage to stockholders if it were not organized on the system described?
A. It could not be run a day organized as the Navy Department is; it could not run a day.
Q. It could not run at all on such a system as prevails in the Navy Department?
A. No, sir.

Can any fair-minded person, Mr. Chairman, with the facts that I have laid before the committee, hesitate to believe that a radical and a speedy reform is necessary to the proper and economical purchase and distribution of supplies for the Naval Department?

The bill, it is confidently believed, will afford the requisite relief, and if enacted into a statute we may surely expect better and more satisfactory results from future appropriations.

We now come to the third most distinguishing feature of the measure, which is to be found in the ninth section, and provides for a board of council to consider and report upon such questions relating to naval affairs and naval policy as shall be referred to it from time to time by the Secretary.

There can scarcely be a doubt as to the propriety of establishing such a board. Its existence is absolutely essential to a wise and successful administration. It is in accordance with the genius of our institutions that the Secretary is taken from the walks of civil life. He undertakes the management of affairs that often require technical skill and long experience in order that they may be properly directed. He has no such skill and possesses no such experience. This board, without either administrative or executive powers, will supply that which is lacking. Thus assisted the Secretary will be enabled to act promptly, vigorously, and judiciously. His decisions will be received with respect and his policy will command approval.

With this explanation, Mr. Chairman, of the more important provisions of this important bill, I will conclude. I trust that it will receive the earnest and careful consideration of the committee. As I have before stated, it should not be regarded as a party measure. It certainly has not been prepared and presented with a view to party advantage or success. Whatever concerns the Army and the Navy should be viewed and disposed of from a non-partisan standpoint, and the efforts of all, Democrats and Republicans alike, should be to do that which will insure the speedy revival of our supremacy upon the seas and the early restoration of our decaying navy-yards to a condition of thorough efficiency.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill. I am opposed to it because I believe it to be contrary to the interests of the naval service, and that its passage would, therefore, be detrimental to the interests of the United States Government. I am opposed to the bill because I do not believe it stands before the House representing what it purports to be. I am opposed to this bill because, instead of being a specific, carefully prepared, and judicious measure of reorganization, submitted by the Navy Department, it is, as I believe, a makeshift, based upon an entire departure from and absolute surrender of the principles that were declared essential when the original proposition for reorganizing the Department was offered.

Mr. HERBERT. May I ask the gentleman whether he was in favor of that original bill?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am inclined, Mr. Chairman, to be very generous in everything connected with debate, and nothing would give me greater pleasure than to consider this measure in a running discussion, but since I have been admonished by my colleague from Texas that it is a waste of the time of the House to "bandy words with the gentleman from Maine," I do not wish my distinguished friend, the chairman of the committee, to put himself into such an unfortunate and useless position.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman refuses, then, to answer my question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I believe that this measure is unnecessary. I believe this measure has not been called for by any authoritative expression either of popular sentiment or from those who have been charged with the administration of our naval affairs or the management and conduct of the various branches of our naval service.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the organization of the Navy Department to-day is adequate to all the demands of the present, and to all the probable requirements of the future. I hold that when a proposition is made to tear up by the roots the organization of one of the great fundamental branches of the United States Government, which has grown year after year as the result of intelligent investigation, the fruit of practical experience—I hold that the obligation rests upon those who champion such a measure to show that it is necessary, and not upon those who oppose it to prove that it is not.

The present organization of the Navy Department was begun more than forty years ago, and has been developed by the needs of the service. Under that organization the Navy of the United States has made a record of achievements unparalleled in the naval history of the world. Under the organization, as it stands to-day, the United States Navy Department, confronted in 1861 with a more formidable task than is likely to confront us in the immediate future, was enabled, almost in the twinkling of an eye, as if by the wand of magic, to call into existence a naval force so great in its power and resources that it could cope successfully with the immense exigencies of a great civil war, and at the same time maintain a blockade of an extent previously unknown in the annals of warfare.

As the Secretary of the Navy of that period, Hon. Gideon Welles, stated in his report of December 5, 1865:

> When hostilities against the Government were commenced in the spring of 1861, and the ports on our southern coast were ordered to be closed under the form of international blockade, instead of the municipal form of an embargo, the labor, embarrassments, and responsibilities suddenly and unexpectedly imposed upon this Department were immensely increased.
> To create and organize a navy such as the order for the blockade required would have been at any time an immense undertaking, but the task was vastly more onerous when the country, after a long interval of peace, was beginning to be rent by civil convulsions. In this condition of affairs, with the navy reduced during fifty years of peace to a low standard of efficiency, without experience or precedent to guide the application of modern inventions to war purposes, with restricted and wholly insufficient navy-yards for the construction and repair of vessels, and without any adequate establishment for the stupendous work before it, the Department was compelled to feel its way and press on its work at the very time when a duty was imposed upon it which a nation fully prepared and furnished with abundant ships and men and material would have found difficulty in performing. But the resources of the country were equal to the emergency. With only limited means at the command of the Department to begin with, the Navy became suddenly an immense power.
> An unrelaxing blockade was maintained for four years from the capes of the Chesapeake to the Rio Grande, while a flotilla of gunboats, protecting and aiding the Army in its movements, penetrated and patrolled our rivers through an internal navigation almost continental from the Potomac to the Mississippi.
> From 7,600 men in service at the commencement of the rebellion, the number was increased to 51,500 at its close. In addition to these the aggregate of artisans and laborers employed in the navy-yards was 16,880, instead of 3,844 previously in the pay of the Government. This is exclusive of those employed in the private ship-yards and establishments, under contracts, constituting an almost equal aggregate number.
> Two hundred and eight vessels have been commenced and most of them fitted for service during this period. A few of the larger ones will require still further time for completion. Only steamers, the propellers also having sailing power, have been built by the Government during my administration of the Department.
> Since the 4th of March, 1861, four hundred and eighteen vessels have been purchased, of which three hundred and thirteen were steamers, at a cost of $18,366,681.83, and of these there have been sold three hundred and forty vessels, for which the Government has received $5,621,800.27.

Under that organization we took the Navy which, in 1861, embraced upon its rolls only 7,600 men, and in four short years trained, equipped, and put into active service 51,500 seamen and officers; and from a force of 3,844 employed in our navy-yards at the outbreak of the rebellion we had organized and efficiently managed a force of mechanics aggregating nearly 17,000 at the various yards throughout the country. During that same period the Government purchased over four hundred vessels, put upon them the armament and equipment necessary to enable them to complete its cordon of fire around our extensive coast, and at the same time placed under construction more than two hundred new ships, some of which are afloat to-day, and although in the mutations of naval architecture they have become obsolete in type they are still bearing the flag of the American Union proudly at mastheads where it was borne through the smoke of naval conflicts such as never before were witnessed on this globe. I say, sir, there rests upon the committee, therefore, the responsibility to show to the country the inefficiency of that organization which has produced results like these.

If we are to have a superior organization, where are we to go for our model and our pattern? Is it to the navy of Great Britain, or of Germany, or of France? Can they point to more glorious proofs or grander fruits of efficient organization than is comprised within this volume of the reports of the Navy Department from 1861 to 1865?

Mr. Chairman, it is somewhat peculiar and significant that the organization of the United States Navy Department, which responded to and so capably met every demand of the Government and of the people during the most important period of our national career, should only have been discovered to be radically incompetent and inefficient after the accession to political power of that party organization which was opposed to the United States Navy, both at the North and at the South, during the time when the letters "U. S. N." were being emblazoned in glory upon our national flag. Perhaps it may be a cause of national regret that in the organization of the Navy Department we did not have during that important period to which I have alluded, which was the trying era in the history of the United States Navy, the benefit of the counsel and assistance of our present ambitious Secretary of the Navy and the indefatigable chairman of the Naval Committee and his able associates upon that side of the Chamber. But as the future Secretary was then laying the foundations for a political career in the metropolis, and our worthy friends of the committee on the other side were engaged at that time, after their own peculiar fashion, in efforts to "consolidate" the United States Navy and reduce the expenses of the Department by getting rid as fast as possible of the surplus of its officers and men by the skillful use of torpedoes and minie balls, we were unable to have the benefit of their suggestion and co-operation.

We had to do the best we could and to get along with such counsels as we could command, and I may say that we have thought, up to this time at least, that we got along pretty well. Now, however, the proposition is made that in order to commence the work of rehabilitating the American Navy we must begin by uprooting the organization under which everything most creditable to the Navy has thus far been achieved.

Mr. Chairman, I have intimated my disbelief in the sincerity of this measure. In doing so I have no desire to reflect upon the motives of any man, but I do purpose to call the attention of this House to some facts in connection with this matter which I think will justify my criticism. After the election of a Democratic President by the people, or perhaps I ought to qualify that by saying after the induction of a Democratic President into office under due forms of law, and the appointment of a Democratic Secretary of the Navy, and the organization of a Democratic House of Representatives in which very naturally those who like myself had the fortune or the misfortune to wear clothing of a certain color during the "late unpleasantness" found ourselves seated at the foot of the table, a proposition came with the tacit or understood indorsement of the Navy Department for a reorganization of that Department upon a distinct and specific basis. I will not stop to read the bill, which I will print with my remarks. Suffice it to say that in place of the eight bureaus now constituting the organization it was proposed to establish three—a bureau of personnel, a bureau of material, construction, and repair, and a bureau of supplies and accounts.

The bill is as follows:

A bill to consolidate the bureaus of the Navy Department, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the 1st day of July next the business of the Department of the Navy shall be distributed by the Secretary of the Navy among the following bureaus and divisions:

First. A bureau of personnel.

Second. A bureau of material, construction, and repair.

Third. A bureau of supplies and account.

SEC. 2. That the chief of the bureau of personnel shall be appointed from the active-list of officers of the Navy, not below the grade of commander.

SEC. 3. That the chief of the bureau of material, construction, and repair may be appointed from civil life or from the active-list of officers of the Navy.

SEC. 4. That the chief of the bureau of supplies and accounts shall be appointed from the active-list of officers of the Navy.

SEC. 5. That a chief of bureau appointed from civil life shall have the highest pay of a commodore.

SEC. 6. That the bureau of personnel shall contain the following divisions:

First. A division of detail and records.

Second. A hydrographic division.

Third. A division of medicine and surgery.

SEC. 7. That the bureau of material, construction, and repair shall contain the following divisions:

First. A division of construction and equipment.

Second. A division of steam engineering.

Third. A division of ordnance.

SEC. 8. That the bureau of supplies and accounts shall contain the following divisions:

First. A division of supplies and purchases.

Second. A division of accounts and audit.

SEC. 9. That officers assigned to duty as heads of divisions shall, while so serving, have the highest pay of their respective grades.

SEC. 10. That the head of the ordnance division of the bureau of material, construction, and repair shall be called the director of naval ordnance. He shall have the relative rank and pay and be appointed in the same manner as the heretofore chief of the Bureau of Ordnance.

SEC. 11. That the head of the division of medicine and surgery of the bureau of personnel shall be entitled the Surgeon-General of the Navy. He shall have the relative rank and pay and be appointed in the same manner as heretofore.

SEC. 12. That all supplies, stores, and materials of every nature required for the use of the Navy or of the Department of the Navy, to be purchased in the United States, or to be purchased abroad and delivered in the United States, shall be purchased by the bureau of supplies and accounts, under the conditions and restrictions provided by law; and the Secretary of the Navy shall, from time to time, establish such regulations regarding the purchase, and the inspection thereof by expert officers, of all supplies, stores, and material as shall assure their being of proper quality and at fair prices.

SEC. 13. That the bureau of supplies and accounts shall be accountable for all supplies, stores, and materials of every nature, ashore or afloat, until actually expended for use by proper authority.

SEC. 14. That at every navy-yard there shall be a pay-officer of the Navy as storekeeper, responsible for all supplies, stores, and materials of every nature in store at such navy-yard, until withdrawn from store for issue or use, on requisition approved by proper authority. His books shall show at all times the number, quantity, or amount of every article received or expended under each head or for each purpose and on hand, with the moneyed value thereof.

SEC. 15. That the bureau of material, construction, and repair shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, maintain and repair all navy-yards with their docks, slips, quay-walls, machine-shops, and each and every building or construction contained therein, together with all vessels of the Navy not in commission. It shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, design, erect, and repair all buildings and other public structures in the United States erected for the use of the naval service or any of its branches; or if designed, repaired, or built by contract, shall supervise and inspect such work.

SEC. 16. That the bureau of material, construction, and repair shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, have charge of and be responsible for the construction and repair of all hulls, engines, boilers, machinery, spars, sails, rigging, and all other outfits, and all ordnance and other equipments for ships built or prepared at the navy-yards, as well as for the supervision and inspection of all construction and repairs executed for the Navy by private parties under contract with the Navy Department.

SEC. 17. That the bureau of personnel, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, shall have charge of the Naval Observatory, the Naval Asylum, and the naval educational establishment; shall direct the movements and inspection of fleets and of vessels acting singly; shall have charge of all ships in commission and the correspondence relating thereto, as well as the movements, employment, and instruction of officers and men, and shall keep their records of service.

SEC. 18. That the clerks and other employés authorized by law for the Department of the Navy shall be assigned to duty in said Department as the Secretary may deem expedient: Provided, That there shall be in the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts a chief accountant, at a salary of $2,500 a year.

SEC. 19. That any business in the Department of the Navy, not provided for above, shall be distributed as the Secretary of the Navy shall judge to be expedient and proper.

SEC. 20. That there shall be in the Department of the Navy a board of council, composed of the chiefs of the several bureaus, the director of naval ordnance, and three officers of the Navy to be detailed from time to time by the Secretary of the Navy; and officers so detailed shall, while on duty, receive the highest pay of their respective grades: Provided, That there shall always be a naval constructor and a chief engineer of the Navy members of the board.

SEC. 21. That the Secretary of the Navy shall, ex officio, be president of the board of council. In his absence the senior officer present shall preside.

SEC. 22. That it shall be the duty of the board of council to consider and report upon such questions relating to naval affairs and naval policy as shall be referred to it from time to time by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, however, That the said board shall have no administrative or executive powers whatsoever.

SEC. 23. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 24. That this act shall take effect from and after the 1st day of July, 1886.

On that the Secretary rested his case, as I understood. It came to us with the sanction and indorsement of the Department. The Secretary had said that these constituted the "natural divisions of the work of the Department." We discussed that measure. We had the attendance of the Secretary and various bureau officers. We had many hearings upon the subject, the result of which was that the measure was entirely abandoned and withdrawn. Subsequently another measure, the bill now before the House, was brought forward in its place. I contend that the measure now under consideration does not fulfill the conditions of the measure originally advocated by the Navy Department. I further contend that in all of the hearings that were had no expression of opinion, so far as I am aware, from any authorized representative of the Navy, or from any one of the heads of the departments, has been made in favor of this measure now before us. Now let us see, Mr. Chairman, as to the novelty of this proposition.

When the Secretary of the Navy was before the committee I asked him the question——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I read now from page 11. I asked him this question:

I should like to ask you, Mr. Secretary, a few questions. Of course we all realize that this is a very important question, and one on which we wish to get all the light we can, and such questions as I shall propound to you I need hardly say will be with a sincere desire to elicit information to enable me to act intelligently. I want to ask you about how many years the present system has been in operation—that is, the substantial features of the present system.

The SECRETARY. Since about 1843 or 1844.

Q. This bill proposes a very radical change in the methods of the Department. As the result of the observation you have made in the past year of the working of the Department, do you feel entire confidence in recommending this radical change in the system?

That is, the bill to which I have referred setting up three distinct bureaus.

The SECRETARY. I do; yes, sir; I think it is the natural system for doing business.

Now, right there, Mr. Chairman, I desire to interpolate the remark that if that bill embodied the natural system for doing business the bill before the House must embody an unnatural system, because it is an entirely different one.

Q. Have your opinions in that regard been formed by your own personal observation during the time you have been in the office, or by reference to the views or recommendations expressed to you during the past by others?

The SECRETARY. Well, as I remarked before, my views were formed from observation. I think an outsider coming into a Department like the Navy, if he is a person who has had anything to do with business, has this advantage, that a thing strikes him more readily than it does a man accustomed to routine. As I said before, my views began to form from my observation in regard to the manner in which the navy-yard work was done, and then up through the Department, the way in which the Secretary was left alone. It was largely observation that formed my views.

Q. Did you organize a board for the purpose of considering this reorganization?

The SECRETARY. No, sir; not on this subject at all.

Then a little farther on:

Q. This is a proposition, as I understand, to reorganize the Department under three distinct heads. To your knowledge, has that system ever been recommended in any official way prior to your report of December last?

The SECRETARY. I do not know that it has, but it is a system that is in general use everywhere but here.

Q. I am speaking about our own service, whether there ever has been any official recommendation in our service?

The SECRETARY. I do not know of any other, but you will find that in other countries there is the same general distribution of functions into these three branches, and the organization is on that basis.

Mr. Chairman, it will be seen that the Secretary placed his whole recommendation upon this specific basis of dividing the bureaus into three distinct branches, and, as I said before, I know of no recommendation that has been made in behalf of the present subdivision provided for by this bill. What then is the difference? The bill now before the House provides for five bureaus instead of three. In the original bill the Bureau of Yards and Docks, the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, the Bureau of Steam Engineering, the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, and the Bureau of Ordnance were abolished; and they were all merged under these three heads. The present bill revives the Bureau of Ordnance, and it revives the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery.

I have neither heard or read any explanation of the restoration of the autonomy of the Bureau of Ordnance and of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, although I believe that both bureaus should be preserved. Nor have I had any explanation of the fact that while in this bill the Bureau of Ordnance and the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery are restored, the Bureau of Steam Engineering is abolished.

Here, for instance, are two great mechanical departments of the Navy—the Bureau of Ordnance that deals with the design and manufacture of guns and gun-carriages and gun equipments. This bill says that department is of sufficient importance to be maintained as a bureau, although every argument advanced by the Secretary of the Navy applied as strongly to the merging and abolition of that Bureau as to either of the others. But at the same time that the framers of this bill restored the autonomy and the dignity of the Bureau of Ordnance and the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery they abolished that other great mechanical bureau of the Department, the Engineering Corps, upon which we are depending more and more as the years go by, and toward which responsibility has been more and more centering for the past quarter of a century. I say I do not know why these distinctions have been made. With a brief experience in the naval service, and such investigation as I have been able to make since this subject has been under consideration, I can find no valid reason for destroying the spirit of emulation or degrading and breaking down the rank, position, and influence of a great department of the naval service which every man who reads and thinks must know is becoming more and more prominent in the construction and maintenance of a naval establishment.

Mr. Chairman, I know something of the jealousies, the rivalries, the unfortunate bickerings that have at times existed between the two corps of the naval and the military service, "the staff and the line," and if I have any prejudice it has naturally caused me to lean toward that corps, the line, with which I was personally identified; but with all the pride that I feel in the prowess of American sailors, dating away back from the days of Jones and Hull and Decatur and Perry, I can not fail to recognize the fact that the tendency has been toward furling the canvas and increasing the steam power—I cannot fail to recognize that in that great conflict of ironclads at Hampton Roads we reached a turning point in the history of the navies of the world, and that from then until now the eyes of the people of every country have been turned more and more to the great mechanical bureaus for the construction of naval engines of warfare. Not that I believe, Mr. Chairman, that any improvements in armament, any modification in the weapons of warfare, will ever take the place of gallantry, of skill, of seamanship, of devotion, of that genius which snatches victory from the jaws of defeat. No. I agree with a former Representative on this floor from New York, Mr. Dorsheimer, who said that in spite of your triple armament of steel the defense of a country upon the sea is still to be found in the hearts of the men that sail the ships and man the guns.

In eighteen hundred and the sixties if a board of naval officers from any country in Europe could have been convened and asked to pass their opinion upon the feasibility of taking a wooden naval fleet past the batteries of Fort Jackson and Fort Saint Philip, on the Mississippi River, doubtless the verdict of such a board would have been that it was impracticable. If a board of naval experts had been called to determine whether the passage of the tremendously fortified gates of Mobile Bay by a fleet of wooden vessels was advisable or justifiable, probably the decision would have been against it. But the genius of Farragut, that magnificent grasp of the situation, that challenging of fate itself which signalizes splendid achievement in war on land or sea, enabled the great admiral to see and to seize his opportunity and to accomplish the impossible by the indomitable heroism of his attempt.

And yet, we can not go to sea in paper ships. We can not trust our vessels of war to be floated about on the ocean by the winds and the waves. We are obliged to keep step to the march of improvement, and the march of improvement—regret it as we may, who have become attached, by a life-time of association, to the swelling canvas and the tapering mast—the march of improvement in fighting ships is in the line of engineering invention and mechanical achievement.

At such a time as this, with the history of the world before us, with the example of every other nation at our command, it is not a good thing to commence a reorganization of the Navy Department which proposes to put a stigma upon, or at least to break down the ambitious and to diminish the honors of, a great corps to which we are looking to-day for the solution of the greatest problems that confront us in regard to this question of a modern navy.

On that point let me quote an authority that ought to be respected by gentlemen on the other side of the House, who are seeking, as they say, to formulate the opinions and wishes of the Navy Department—a tribute which I might say has been almost unconsciously paid by the present head of the Navy Department to this very bureau which it is proposed to wipe out of existence. Criticism has been made in certain quarters to the effect that our engineering bureau has failed to achieve its purposes or vindicate its ability.

Mr. Chairman, that is aside from the discussion of this question, because this bill does not touch the personnel of the bureaus, except in regard to regulating the rank and position of the chiefs. But, in answer to these criticisms, let me quote in behalf of a corps of my former comrades for whom I learned to feel respect in "times that tried men's souls," let me cite in their behalf the tribute of the present Secretary of the Navy. In his last annual report, speaking of the new vessels that it is proposed to construct, he refers to those that are to be built upon an English model—those British cruisers that are to bear the American flag—and then he goes on to say:

The Department during this time has kept itself in consultation with the leading ship-builders of the country, who feel themselves greatly concerned and interested in the success of the Department in these matters. The Department, having in the course of its efforts purchased plans including the detailed drawings of the motive power of two of the most recent productions of Sir William Armstrong & Co., was strongly recommended by the several practical ship-builders who were consulted to reproduce the machinery in two of the new ships, and to construct the other three upon the designs of the bureaus. This course has been adopted. This intention has greatly stimulated the work of the Department, and it is hoped that the four thousand-ton ship designed by the bureaus will mark not only a very great advance over the last ships designed by them, but even over those built on the plans which have been obtained from abroad.

The Secretary here tells us that the engineering bureau is expected by him to produce results superior to the best that he has been able to obtain abroad; yet at the same time we are informed by implication—and only by implication, for I find no such direct recommendation by the Secretary—we are informed that the Secretary is proposing to break down the autonomy of this great engineering bureau, and, at the very hour when Congress and the country are looking to it to place the American Navy, as he says, in advance of the best achievements of the world, to deprive that bureau of its honors, take away the spur to its ambition, and refuse that recognition of its dignity and importance to which it has hitherto been deemed entitled.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman permit me to correct him at this point?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Very briefly.

Mr. HERBERT. The bill does not propose to break down the "autonomy" of the Bureau of Engineering, but simply to make that bureau a division of engineering, its "autonomy" remaining the same but its independence a little less. It is proposed to make it a division of a bureau, which bureau shall have to do with everything that concerns the construction of a ship, engines and all. The "autonomy" of the Construction Bureau, as well as that of the Engineering Bureau, is preserved, but those bureaus are simply made subordinate, under one common head. That is all.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It may be that my friend from Alabama states this matter a great deal better than I do; but he does not state it differently at all.

Mr. HERBERT. I thought I did.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I think it is not necessary for the gentleman to enforce upon the House that which I have been painstakingly attempting to set forth for about half an hour. This bill does destroy the autonomy of the Naval Bureau of Engineering; it wipes it out of existence. Pass this bill and the Bureau of Steam-Engineering goes "glimmering through the dream of things that were." Yet the gentleman says that his bill does not disturb it! He has taken the original bill in which all these bureaus were merged into three, and after setting that aside he has come forward and restored the Bureau of Ordnance and the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery and relegated the Bureau of Steam-Engineering to the rank of a mere division. Yet he tells me that he has not interfered with the dignity of that bureau!

I think I understand the significance of ordinary language; I think I appreciate the difference which will be effected if this House shall amend this bill by putting in a line restoring the "Bureau" of Engineering. I think that to have a bureau of Material, Construction, and Repair, in which the Bureau of Steam Engineering merges its identity, and to which it surrenders all its independence, is a different thing from maintaining the bureau as at present. The chief of the Bureau of Material, Construction, and Repair may be appointed from civil life or from the active-list of the officers of the Navy and shall be skilled in naval architecture. The head of that bureau is not required to have even a primary knowledge of marine engineering. This bill abolishes a great bureau of the service, and does it, as I believe, upon an absolutely insufficient pretext and basis.

But I do not rest my case there; that is only a sample; that is only one of the objectionable features of this bill. The argument was made that this consolidation, so called, was rendered necessary in order to do away with the duplication of functions in the various navy-yards. The complaint originally—and I was very familiar with it at the time—the complaint originally was that among the subordinates at the navy-yards different functions were multiplied; that, for instance, the Engineering Bureau had a painter, the Construction Bureau a painter, the Bureau of Supplies a painter, and so on; that there were too many of these because each of the bureaus had its own painters and blacksmiths, &c., workmen and foremen. This has been reported upon time out of mind.

Everybody who knows anything about the Navy knows how the things complained of came about; and I believe that everybody who knows as much as he ought to know about the Navy, knows that if we were plunged into a great war again, and called upon to work night and day in building ships and fitting them out, we would in all probability have just that duplication and multiplication of minor employés. The criticism is that of a time of peace. When we were engaged in fitting out ships on the instant, it was deemed necessary for every department to be prepared to perfect its work in the speediest manner possible; and I believe as firmly as I believe anything that the most competent officer you may put at the head of a navy-yard to-day, if called upon to put that yard at work to the utmost limit of its capacity, would, in many cases, duplicate these functions, just as has been done hitherto. What did it amount to?

Take the New York navy-yard. In time of war you are building there a number of ships and repairing a number of others. There is engineer work to be done, ordnance work, carpenter work, the building of spars, &c. Now there is painting to be done in all these departments. One man can not do it; you must have a number of painters; and in the course of your organization you delegate one painter to take charge of the painting for the Engineer Bureau; another to take charge of the painting for the Construction Bureau, &c. The result is that by mere force of convenience and system, if you have a well organized system, you have men trained for specialties, men engaged in doing specific things, with their proper tools assembled at the proper place, conveniently at hand, to do the business required of them. Now, disband your Navy; drop from a war footing to a peace footing in a moment; then go to your navy-yards, and you will find a great many more painters there than you need; you will find more blacksmiths than you need; you will find more foremen, more leading men, than you need.

You find, perhaps, at a given time that one man with a paint brush and a paint pot can go around the yard and do all the painting that is necessary for the different departments. Then you set up a cry that the whole system has been wrong; that you must reform it altogether; that you must begin by reorganizing the bureaus of the Navy Department.

Now, this majority report has undertaken to give here the report of an expert board and to make it appear—again I say I am not imputing improper motives—but the majority report, if it means anything, means to convince the members of this House that a commission of naval officers, appointed to consider this subject of reorganizing the Navy Department, has favored some such plan as that embodied in this bill. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand the original book. It is the report of a commission, not on the Navy Department, not on the reorganization of naval bureaus, but the "report of the commission on navy-yards." And every word of recommendation in that report is with reference to consolidating, simplifying, and putting on a peace basis the work of the different mechanical departments in the navy-yards.

Let us read. The majority report lays great stress upon the recommendation that is undoubtedly made by these gentlemen to do away with the duplication, or rather the multiplication, of these petty officers or employés, but the report of the majority quotes from that report down to a certain point and then stops. Where the report stops was within just seven lines of the completion of the commission's report. I do not pretend to say why my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, did not manage to squeeze in the other seven lines, but he did not, and I am going to read them here to show the House that this report of Admiral Luce, Chief Engineer Loring, and Mr. Mullett did not recommend and did not apply their recommendations to a reorganization of the Navy Department.

Said this board in conclusion:

Upon the consummation of so desirable an event, which need not necessarily change the general character of the present organization of the Department, the scheme for the consolidation, the proper classification of duties, and the abolition of all unnecessary employés in the navy-yards can be carried into effect without difficulty and with the essential elements of permanency insured.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, in favor of which this report is quoted, legislates out of existence the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and yet the very report from which the chairman quotes makes the following recommendations as to the method of achieving the reform they desire and propose:

We, therefore, recommend for the proper execution of these suggestions that full plans and estimates for each of the above-mentioned yards be prepared under the immediate supervision of the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks.—

* * * * * * *

Further:

To carry out these views, we recommend a special board be appointed, and that plans be prepared under the immediate supervision of the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

And yet, with those specific recommendations for the accomplishment of reform, by and through the co-operation of the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, they quote that report as in favor of abolishing that chief and his bureau outright.

The report specifically says that it refers to "improvements in the system of performing work at the navy-yards." The scheme, it says, is "for the reorganization of the working force of our navy-yards." All the way through this report the commission devote themselves and apply their recommendations solely to the reorganization of the work in the navy-yards.

And more than that, they did not indulge in wholesale denunciation of what they found in the yards, but they distinctly recognize the transition from a time of war to a time of peace.

But, Mr. Chairman, another argument in behalf of some such measure as this was attempted to be made on the ground that there is no systematic method of controlling the accounts of the Navy. When this bill was under consideration special stress was laid upon the allegation that at the present time there is no method of ascertaining or keeping the accounts of the disbursement and the receipts of the Navy Department. When we had the Department officers before us I put a question to the Secretary of the Navy in regard to that matter, and the Secretary was mistakenly under the impression there did not exist any method of keeping account of the expenditures and receipts of these various bureaus. I quote from the report of the committee hearing:

The SECRETARY. There is no set of books, as I understand, in the Navy Department where an account of the different supplies of the various bureaus is kept as a merchant keeps his stock account, and where you can find at any time what you have got, how much has been expended, or where it has gone. Now it is proposed in this bill to organize that matter and put it into one branch of the service.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Suppose you have your system—and we will take this purchase for the Engineering Bureau, for instance; they purchase a large amount of coal, and these purchases are reported to the Chief of the Bureau of Supplies. What would that officer do, or what could he do, in regard to these expenditures other than is now done by the Auditor?

The SECRETARY. The Auditor does not keep any of these accounts.

Mr. BOUTELLE. He examines them to see whether the expenditures are made according to law.

The SECRETARY. He keeps no books by which you can see how much coal has been bought for the Engineering department.

Mr. BOUTELLE. No; but you can find that in the Engineering department.

The SECRETARY. I doubt if you can.

Mr. THOMAS. You mean that you can find the number of bushels of coal, but no financial account, and it is the same way with Equipment and Surgery. The account shows so much quinine, bandages, &c., but there is no account that shows how much they cost and how much has been expended for them, or the value of what is on hand.

Mr. BOUTELLE. You mean no account in the Navy Department?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir. It is for the purpose of bringing these things into a financial department that this change is proposed, and I think it is a very wise one.

There was set forth a distinct and unequivocal allegation of a grave defect in the methods of the Department. When the chiefs of bureaus were examined, however, a very different light was thrown upon the subject. I read a question to Commodore Harmony, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and his reply:

By Mr. BOUTELLE:

Q. I understood this morning some one to say—I don't know precisely who made the statement—that at present it is impossible to ascertain at the Navy Department the expenditures in any department. Is it not a fact that the expenditures in the Bureau of Yards and Docks, the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, the Bureau of Equipment and Supplies, and the Bureau of Ordnance are all accurately kept?

A. I can say as far as my own bureau is concerned that in fifteen minutes I can show the expenditures and the balance on hand.

The following positive answers were given by Commodore Schley, Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting:

By Mr. THOMAS:

Q. In regard to this matter of duplication of shops, &c., in the navy-yards, is it not a fact that under the authority of the Secretary alone more or less consolidation has already been effected in some of the bureaus?

A. Yes, sir; I think that is the case.

Q. I would like to ask you one question bearing somewhat on matters that came up here yesterday. Is it or is it not true that at the present time, if I were to go to the Navy Department this morning, I should be unable to obtain information there as to the expenditures in the Bureaus of Equipment and Recruiting, and Surgery, or Ordnance?

A. I do not think it would take you five minutes to ascertain anything you wanted.

By Mr. THOMAS:

Q. Do you keep an account in your bureau of the value of the articles purchased for that bureau?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you keep an account of the money value of the articles expended in your department?

A. Yes, sir; it is submitted to me monthly.

Q. Where do these accounts go to from you?

A. They do not go out of my bureau at all.

Q. There is no supervision of that?

A. Not beyond myself.

Q. There is no point in your Department where the whole financial transactions of that Department can be found in a summarized condition?

A. No; not at present.

Q. You can tell, you say, in five minutes the exact financial condition of your bureau?

A. I said in five. I would say in ten.

Q. In ten minutes?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. As to the money value of all stores on hand?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. As to how much has been expended during the month?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And how much—not only in quantity but in value—on hand at the end of the month?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is that true of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery?

A. That I do not know.

Q. Is that true as to the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing?

A. I do not think there is a doubt of it.

In reply to a question by Mr. LORE, Surgeon-General Gunnell also said on this subject:

Each chief of a bureau makes to the Secretary of the Navy every week a report of all the business of his office, the several purchases made, all the contracts made, &c. The chief of the bureau is required to draw upon the Secretary for the transfer of money to the pay-officers of the Navy, to enable them to pay the bills of the office. He thus informs the Secretary a second time of his transactions. These papers go to the disbursing officer of the Navy Department—a very experienced and competent officer—who is supposed to examine them before they go to the Secretary. In reply to a question just now, I can say that the Bureau of Medicine is ready at any time to furnish the account of the money on hand, the money expended, and the property on hand, and where it is.

By Mr. THOMAS:

Q. Together with its value?

A. Well, there is no difficulty in that, because we have so little money to be paid; but where large contracts are to be made in some of the bureaus it may require very much more care. With regard to the suggestion made by Commodore Schley, that there might be an office of audit in the Department, I would say again that there is a disbursing clerk who is, to some extent, such an auditing officer, and it could be done by adding to the office of the Secretary of the Navy an experienced Navy pay-officer, to whom all contracts and requisitions for money would go before a dollar was expended.

Q. Can that be done now?

A. By order of the Secretary it can. I am surprised that that has not been done. The Secretary can detail a pay-officer of experience, who has been on duty in every part of the world, making inspection of purchases, as well as performing the other duties of paymaster; a bonded officer, who handles large sums of money, and into his hands every requisition and proposed contract would pass. Of course there is a law officer in the Department to pass on the legality of such contracts.

By Mr. BOUTELLE:

Q. That is the judge-advocate?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You are in favor of such an office?

A. I think as these papers are sent from each bureau to the Secretary they could go to the hands of the chief clerk, and to the officer thus attached to the Department, an experienced man, before a dollar was transferred; and, if there was any fault, either to return the papers to the bureau for correction or let the Secretary call for an explanation of it.

Q. Would you have them keep the books showing the business of each bureau?

A. No, sir; because the books of the bureau are always open. Each bureau has its monthly account of all amounts on hand, and makes weekly statements of every dollar it spends. So long as we are anxious about the management of the office, and looking for all possible faults to be found, it is not probable that an accident of any kind can happen to us. Of course, no office can be more honest than the men that manage it; but if the men in the Navy Department are careful I can not see how under the present system a dollar of money can be lost to the Government. If this officer I speak of be appointed, I do not see how an error could occur without detection.

By Mr. THOMAS:

Q. Under the present system are there any reports made to you at stated periods of the expenditures on medical and surgical appliances?

A. Quarterly and annual reports.

Q. In which the quantity as well as the value is stated?

A. Yes, sir; the quantity; and the values are noted on invoices.

Q. And the balance on hand is also stated?

A. Yes, sir; that has to be done whenever a medical officer makes the requisition. We have forms for quarterly requisitions, and on them is a column in which the amount on hand is stated as well as the amount required. I am sorry that it did not occur to me that these questions would come up, or I would have had these forms here.

Commodore Loring, Chief of the Bureau of Steam-Engineering, bore similar testimony in reply to questions, as follows:

By Mr. THOMAS:

Q. Could not the Secretary, by means of a Department order, require a full and complete financial and material statement to be transmitted to him from each of the several bureaus and from each of the several departments?

A. It could be done by my bureau daily. We have weekly statements of purchases from each yard and monthly statements of labor and material expended on each piece of work in hand.

Q. Suppose, as has been suggested, that a paymaster of experience and ability should be detailed to take charge of the accounts, and that all these accounts, by direction of the Secretary, were sent to him, could not the Secretary in that way and without the aid of additional law be able to ascertain the condition of affairs as completely as if a department of accounts was authorized by law?

A. Quite so; decidedly; I see no limit to his power in that direction.

Q. As the Secretary of the Navy is the responsible head of the Department, could not this office of accounts be attached to his office?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And thereby be brought as completely under his control and under his direction and supervision as if a separated department was authorized by law?

A. I see nothing of the kind that is not quite possible under the present law.

Q. Don't you think that would be a very wise step to take?

A. Yes; a very desirable step.

But it does not seem necessary to quote further evidence to show that the Secretary of the Navy was laboring under serious misapprehension in regard to the system of records and accounts in operation in the various bureaus of the Department, or to demonstrate that so far as the demand for reorganization was based upon his erroneous views as to the manner in which the business is conducted it appears to be unsustained.

But if it could be shown that a new system of keeping accounts is necessary it would by no means follow that it would require a reorganization of the Navy Department to accomplish the result. Those of us who oppose this bill insist that the Secretary of the Navy has ample authority under existing laws to establish all such administrative changes or reforms as are advocated by him, and in the report of the minority of the committee is cited the official evidence that such authority has been exercised by other Secretaries. General Order 293 of March 30, 1882, issued by Secretary Hunt, sets forth and specifically prescribes the duties of each of the bureaus of the Department.

In 1877 Secretary Thompson, of his own volition and under the existing laws, organized a board of council in every way as authoritative and effective as that proposed to be provided for by law in this bill.

But more pertinent to this discussion is the fact that the present Secretary has himself asserted the sufficiency of his power in this regard by issuing a general order on December 4, 1886, in which he makes a sweeping transfer of the property of the various bureaus to the custody of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing:

[General Order No. 355.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 4, 1886.

On the 1st day of January, 1887, all stores and supplies, and the records of all property and plants at navy-yards and stations, appertaining to and belonging to the Navy Department, with the exceptions of vessels and of stores and supplies coming under the cognizance of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery and of the Marine Corps, will be transferred to the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing.

At the navy-yards and stations there will be an officer of the pay corps designated as the general storekeeper, who will, on the above date, be given charge of all stores and supplies, and of the records of property and plants at their respective yards and stations, and inventories embracing the same, showing quantities and values in detail, will be furnished to him by the officers representing the several bureaus, and now in charge of said property, and he will receipt for the same, subject to such corrections as may be found necessary when said inventories can be verified to his satisfaction.

The 1st day of July, 1887, is fixed upon as the date, by which time proper arrangements must be made for having concentrated, in one or more store-houses, such stores and supplies as should be so stored and guarded as to enable the general storekeeper to assume a rigid responsibility for their proper care and expenditure.

The property accounts of the several bureaus will be kept separate, and until the 1st day of July, 1887, the necessary books and blank forms now prescribed will be used, and the reports and returns required by existing orders and regulations will be regularly made and forwarded.

The civil employés and laborers now connected with the accounts and care of the stores and supplies will be transferred to the office of the general storekeeper, and he will control their services, they being continued on the rolls and paid by the bureaus from which they are transferred.

An officer of the Engineer Corps, a boatswain, a carpenter, and a sailmaker will be assigned to duty under the general storekeeper, and he will define their duties and responsibilities.

On board of vessels, all equipments, outfits, and supplies, with the exceptions of those pertaining to the medical department and Marine Corps, will, on the first day of the quarter following the receipt of this order, be transferred to the charge of the pay officer, and complete inventories will be furnished to him by those now having charge of said property, for which receipts will be given. The pay officer, until further instructed, will use the books and blank forms now prescribed in making reports and returns to the several bureaus.

A separate property account in each department will be kept, and all articles in use and under the control of officers will be receipted for, and such receipt will carry with it an accountability for the same.

The engineers and the equipment yeomen will be attached to the pay department.

Any and all orders or regulations conflicting with this order are hereby annulled.

WILLIAM C. WHITNEY,
Secretary of the Navy.

Whatever may be thought of the feasibility and desirability of this new departure, the issuing of that circular is a proclamation by the Secretary that the enactment of such a bill as that now pending is not necessary to the accomplishment of one of the most important changes in the methods of doing business which he has advocated.

But, Mr. Chairman, my time will not suffice to state in detail many other important objections to this bill. I find that my hour has nearly expired and I must depend upon the opportunities of the debate under the five-minute rule to briefly call attention to other features of this sweeping measure which should, as I believe, deprive it of the sanction of members of Congress who have at heart the future usefulness and honor of the United States Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. MILLS took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment House bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 1085) for the relief of Albion S. Keith; and

A bill (H. R. 5692) for the relief of James B. Russell.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 3023) to authorize the Kansas, Texas and Southwestern Railway Company to build its road across the Fort Hays Military Reservation;

A bill (S. 3044) to provide for the execution of the provisions of article 2 of the treaty concluded between the United States of America and the Emperor of China on the 17th day of November, 1880, and proclaimed by the President of the United States on the 5th day of October, 1881;

A bill (S. 3050) granting a pension to Mary A. Logan; and

A bill (S. 3087) to increase the pension of Mrs. Apolline A. Blair.

The message also returned to the House of Representatives the bill (S. 990) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, found to be mineral lands.

CONSOLIDATION OF NAVY BUREAUS.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. MCADOO. I am glad that it seems to be recognized on both sides of the Chamber that this is a purely business question as to the proper administration of a great establishment of the Government, and has no connection whatever with either person or politics.

Mr. Chairman, if an individual should find himself in possession of the naval establishment of the United States to run it from the national Treasury as it is now managed by the Department he would be confronted at the outset with eight little principalities, absolutely independent of each other, instead of one concentrated head management. On entering the navy-yards of the country he would find that there are eight duplicate sets of shops for as many bureaus, if they need them; that each one of these bureaus was as distinct from the other as a petty kingdom in Germany, before it became the now consolidated Empire of Germany was from its fellows; that if he wished to have repairs made to a vessel it would be a grave question as to which of these bureaus should perform the work. He would be confronted by more than that. He would meet a system of official caste such as is without parallel except in the history of the Hindoos. My esteemed and eloquent friend from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] calls attention to the fact that this bureaucratic system began in 1842. If I did not know him to be an extremely truthful man I would be inclined to doubt the accuracy of that statement.

I have before me an "Encyclopedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature" [laughter], which is of course religious and certainly true, and which deals with the question of Hindoo caste, and I think that both of my able colleagues who have addressed the House upon this question, after hearing me read from it, will agree with me that the bureaucratic system of the United States Navy, from the great similarity existing between them, must have been founded upon this Oriental religion. Says this writer:

There is, however, after a general fashion, a maintenance of the general classifications, as (1) Brahmins, (2) Kshattriyas, (3) Vaishyas, and (4) Sudra, below which is a yet more debased class (5) known as Pariahs, or outcasts, to be found in all portions of the country. The four greater castes above named answer to priestly, warrior, agricultural, and artisan, or servant class. We note in this census return hereditary priests, rope-dancers, sweepers, elephant-drivers, turban-winders, ear-piercers and cleaners, charmers, makers of crowns for idols, and even hereditary beggars and common blackguards.

[Laughter.]

Rules: These castes are all hereditary, the son always following the occupation of the father, however overburdened some departments of occupation may become by the accidents of birth. No classes except the highest two assume to intermarry, and all eschew contact with a lower class. They do not eat together, nor cook for, nor serve food to each other. This dislike of contact extends to their vessels and other utensils. The usages, however, seem often arbitrary. Smoking from the bowl of another's pipe may not be an offense, if one can make a stem of his fist; but the stem or snake of the pipe must not be touched, or it is rendered worthless to all parties. It is in accordance with caste requirements that brass or copper utensils should be moved from place to place, but an earthen vessel once used for cooked food or water must not be transported to another locality. Loads may be carried on the head by some castes, on the back by some, and not at all by others.

Probably like the bureau system of the Navy here, this being its equivalent among the Hindoos:

The poorest Hindoo family do not wash their own clothes, yet the loin cloth must always be washed by the wearer of it. If the Hindoo were touched by a man of inferior caste while eating he would not only throw away all the food he had cooked, but would spit out what might chance to be in his mouth at the instant.

The accumulation of motive for the preservation of caste purity is astounding. The slightest variation from custom is at once visited with punishment or fines, while the gravest offense becomes the ground of expulsion literally from all human society, and of disabilities in business and disinheritance, and, believing in ancestor worship as the Hindoo does, and that the happiness of his departed relatives is dependent on his performing the manes, the additional curse comes upon him of being disabled from performing these ceremonies because of caste impurity. The caste policy of India checks genius; yet as from the first the individual knows what his life business is to be, he pursues it, and attains a skill in handicraft unequaled. The India system tends likewise to give permanence to institutions, but it unfortunately perpetuates evils also.

Why, sir, in the United States Navy to-day this caste system has gone so far that it can only be paralleled by the situation of an American in India who is compelled to have eight or ten servants in place of two, for if one servant of one class lays down an iron pot, it can only be raised up by another of the same class. A servant of a different class dare not touch it.

Now, sir, the case on behalf of this bill has been so fully, so ably, and thoroughly presented by my colleague from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] that I need say little in its defense; but I want to answer some few objections which have been made in opposition to it. The strongest argument of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] is this: that under this system the Navy of the United States was carried through the great civil war; and the gentleman very forcibly and ably, and no doubt truthfully, presents its remarkable achievements during that struggle—achievements marked by an invention and daring seldom if ever before equaled.

Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman reflect that so far as the people of the Northern States were concerned in that struggle they were determined that no amount of treasure or sacrifice of blood should prevent the preservation of the Union? And I am firmly convinced in looking over the history of naval expenditures for twenty-five years past that while that Navy did achieve and perform extraordinary feats of valor, some of them unparalleled in the history of naval operations, I believe that owing to this bureaucratic system it was at an increased cost to the tax-payers of this Union.

In other words, I believe that if the consolidated bureau system had been adopted in 1859 the same results would have been secured, the same glory would have been achieved by the United States Navy, while at the same time it would have been accomplished at a far less cost to the people of the United States than has resulted from the fact of the existence of these eight independent bureaus of the Navy Department. Indeed, the efficiency of the Navy, great as it was, would have been increased, while its economic administration would have been secured, and, better than all, we should really have had some Navy left after the conflict was over.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I think the severest commentary upon the existing system is the deplorable condition in which our Navy was left at the close of the war, and in which it has continued since the war up to this day. What are the fruits of this system as exhibited by the official figures? The fruits of this system, Mr. Chairman, are apparent to all men. I need not go into the minute details, as has been done here on the floor to-day, to show that we have absolutely no navy. But I call the attention of the House to this startling array of figures showing that the Secretary of the Navy for this year asks $25,435,979.02 to conduct an establishment that has as its best vessel but one second-rate wooden cruiser carrying ten smooth-bore guns. Twenty-five millions and over of dollars for a naval establishment that floats on the high seas to-day one second-rate wooden cruiser with obsolete guns, incapable of defense and incapable of offense! Our Navy can not fight, it can not run away; it could not even sink in comparative decency.

If the gentleman from Maine is willing to have this bureaucratic, autocratic system tried by its fruits, well and good. If these are the results it has produced, then I bespeak for this bill the unanimous vote almost of this intelligent House. And we have the further fact that the yards and docks of seven navy-yards and two naval stations are in such a condition to-day that nearly $5,000,000, it has been estimated by the chiefs of the bureau which has control of them, will be required to put them even in a state of decent repair.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think, as regards the members of this House who are not connected with the Naval Committee, and consequently may not have devoted the same care and attention to this subject as the members of that committee, there is one thing that must appear to them as very singular. The gentleman from Maine, in his labored defense of the present system, called attention to the various criticisms which have been made upon it by admirals, by commodores, by boards, by commissions, and by secretaries, and seeks to defend it from the aspersions and criticisms which they have cast upon it.

It is singular indeed, Mr. Chairman, that in all this mass of official correspondence, in all these findings of commissions, in these reports of commodores and chiefs and secretaries, not one word is to be found in favor of the existing system. The gentleman may endeavor to contort the language of criticism of Secretary after Secretary, of chief and commodore, and admiral after chief, and commodore, and admiral, but he can not find one single word in all this mass of official communication, finding, report, or decision—not one single line—in behalf of the eight bureaus which exist to-day. The witnesses are all against him, and he has no evidence to offer in rebuttal. If this system is a grand, efficient, and glorious one, why do they not say so?

Mr. Chandler, a man of marked mental ability, was for four years at the head of the Navy Department. Mr. Chandler, in report after report, called attention to the fact that concentration of these bureaus was necessary; that there was a prolixity and a diffuseness, if I may use the terms, in regard to the conduct of naval business. He brought that matter to the attention of Congress by his reports, and if he did not persevere as Mr. Whitney is now doing in demanding that Congress shall by law allow him to carry out his reform, it is no reflection on Mr. Chandler.

The first objection made in the minority report to the passage of this bill is the fact that it casts aspersion upon what has already existed; so that we are asked to perpetuate the system of official bureaucratic red tape, to perpetuate these abuses, to preserve these duplications and multiplications of workshops, these little, separate armies of the same class of workmen, because, forsooth, we might cast an aspersion upon that which has existed for so long a time. In other words, Mr. Chairman, the age of the abuse, the continuance of it for so many years, is held up as an unanswerable argument why we, the representatives of the people, should not pass this bill and reform this abuse altogether.

As to some results, Mr. Chairman, which have grown up under this abuse I may state to the members of this House that while from some one of the navy-yards may come a requisition for a single article from a certain bureau, another bureau in that very yard may have sufficient of the same article to supply the Navy for a period of years. I here read from Secretary Whitney's report:

> The inventory shows a very large and unnecessary accumulation of stores and supplies by the different bureaus, aggregating over $20,000,000 in appraised value. The board reports between three and four millions in value to be obsolete and useless at the present time, only entailing expense for keepers and constant care to preserve them in condition. Among these accumulations some very absurd facts appear. At the eight navy-yards there have accumulated altogether of augers and bits 46,566, of which 25,274 have been lying for several years at closed yards, where no work has been or is likely to be done. Twenty-nine thousand five hundred and forty-two gross of screws are on hand, 10,896 gross lying at closed yards. There are 146,385 files in stock, 42,142 of them lying at closed yards. There are 11,813 paint brushes in stock, 2,246 of these in the stores at closed yards. All of these tools are serviceable, mostly new.

When stock was taken of the stores in the possession of these bureaus at the yards it was found that we had a supply of some articles beyond the requirements of the Navy for all time almost, while at the same time we were actually buying the very same things for another bureau. Why, Mr. Chairman, as an object lesson, these eight bureaus are so distinct, they have so much individuality of their own, their autonomy has been so carefully preserved, that you might erect to-day in this capital city eight large public buildings to hold each one of these bureaus with its retinue of retainers. The Bureau of Engineering is as distinct from the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery as the Post-Office Department from that of the Interior. The portions of the navy-yards which these men rule over are little principalities, and the foot of no intruder is allowed within the sacred precincts of the department where they preside.

It is not, Mr. Chairman, the fault of the personnel of the Navy. The officers to-day in charge of the United States Navy are as able, as efficient, as brave, as patriotic as any similar body of men in the world. They are as capable of conducting and fighting a great navy as the officers of any similar institution anywhere in the universe. But the Navy has been hampered, has been clouded, has been retarded, by this official red-tapeism which has crushed its endeavors to increase its material and its efficiency.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] alludes to the report made by Commodore Luce as one of the commissioners to investigate these abuses. He says that while the commodore presents the evils which exist, he declares that the remedy is not to be found in consolidation. At that time no such bill as this had been mooted. The commodore's attention had not been directed to any such scheme as that which is now presented to this House. But from the strength with which he sets forth the evils that exist, and from the way in which he calls attention to the existing system of duplication, I am convinced that if this bill had been presented to that commission of honorable and upright officers they would have indorsed it.

Another criticism made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE]—I presume made by him, as he signs the minority report—is that the present Secretary of the Navy has receded from his first position; that he made a more radical proposition at first, namely, that there should be three bureaus, one of personnel, one of construction, and one of purchase and accounts, and that he has abandoned that proposition. That the Secretary retreated from the proposition for a bureau of personnel seems to the gentlemen who signed the minority report an argument why we should not accept any proposition coming from that same source.

But, Mr. Chairman, what are the facts of the case? When the bill first came to the committee it is true that there was a provision for a bureau of personnel. That proposition was assailed in the Committee on Naval Affairs and was abandoned. That the Secretary of the Navy, without retracting anything which he has advanced, without altering his opinions in any particular, should be willing to take from this House what he can get, is not, to my mind, singular; but it is singular that that fact should be advanced here as a reason why this House should refuse to pass any measure of reform. That the Secretary started out to radically reform the Department and this bureau system, and that he is now willing to take a measure of reform—is that to be advanced as an argument why we should refuse to pass this bill, which is designed to give some measure of relief to the overcrowded naval establishment?

It is said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] that there is already a sufficient check upon the accounts of the Navy Department. While he admits that you can not go to any central authority and find out just how much has been expended, yet he says that by going to each bureau and getting the several amounts and adding them together you can thus obtain the total which has been spent upon the naval establishment; and then, he says, you have also the Fourth Auditor as a check upon the naval accounts.

What is the duty of the Fourth Auditor in connection with the accounts of the naval establishment? A mere perfunctory auditing of the accounts. The bills, in the first place, go to the bureau which incurs them, and they are paid. Then they go to the Fourth Auditor, who audits them; but he has no knowledge of the bills, and therefore his auditing of them is simply perfunctory, and is no check whatever upon extravagance.

Mr. Chairman, what objection can there be to a consolidation of the bureaus which shall buy supplies and keep the accounts?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will my colleague permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. McADOO. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do I understand my colleague on the committee to assert that better results would be obtained by having the accounts audited by the same bureau that incurs the liabilities?

Mr. McADOO. No; I am arguing the very opposite of that.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But I understood my friend to object to the auditing of these accounts by the Fourth Auditor, on the ground that that officer is not familiar with the details of the bills.

Mr. McADOO. No. I am sorry the gentleman misunderstood me. My argument is that the auditing of these accounts by the Fourth Auditor is merely perfunctory, and therefore that it does not do away with the necessity for the consolidation asked for in this bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. How would you have the accounts audited?

Mr. McADOO. I would have them audited by the Fourth Auditor, as a Treasury official. But if I understood the gentleman from Maine right he adduced as a reason why this purchasing and accounting bureau should not be consolidated the fact, as he claims it to be, that we have safety now in the supervision of the Fourth Auditor. I, on the other hand, contend that there will be greater safety in providing that one bureau shall buy and keep the accounts.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The same bureau?

Mr. McADOO. One bureau to buy all the stores and keep the accounts.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is just what I understood the gentleman's argument to be. Then the gentleman does believe that it is better to have the accounts audited by the same bureau that incurs the bills?

Mr. McADOO. I believe it is better to have the accounts kept by a bureau of supplies and accounts; and if they are afterward audited in the Treasury Department also, well and good.

Mr. Chairman, there is another and somewhat subtle argument against this bill—that it will interfere somewhat with the chiefs of certain bureaus, and may militate somewhat against the staff as in favor of the line. If we in this House are going to refrain from working a reform in government simply because some person may be injured, then reform will never be accomplished. It may be true—I do not say it is not—that some one man of long experience and of great value in his department may find his powers curtailed by this bill. That some portion of the staff may have their ambition somewhat checked may be true.

But is that a reason, Mr. Chairman, why we should not reduce to common-sense principles, why we should not conduct on a sound business basis a great establishment of the Government, simply because we are afraid of stepping on the official toes of some dignitary of the Navy? I can not, for myself, see anything in this bill that does injury to any branch of the naval establishment, whether staff or line. There is not one word in the bill that takes from the Secretary of the Navy the right to put a staff officer at the head of a bureau. There is not one word that takes a single power from the Secretary of the Navy. I would be opposed to the bill if it had any such effect; for I believe that in a republic like ours there should always be between the people and a military establishment a civilian head.

I was opposed to the proposition which was sought to be incorporated in a former bill to provide a bureau of personnel who should direct solely, and as I thought autocratically, the movements of the military arm of the Navy; because I believed then, as I have now stated, that in a popular government it is right that there should be a man of the people at the head of the military branch of the Government. That objection has been removed. This bill leaves the Bureau of Navigation and all these other bureaus as they are to-day, solely at the command of the Secretary of the Navy, and does not take from him one iota of his discretion or his ability to carry out any reform that he may think necessary.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will my colleague on the committee state what disposition under this bill is to be made of yards and docks?

Mr. McADOO. I confess to my colleague on the Naval Committee—I will be entirely frank with him—that if there is a weak spot in this bill it is the failure to preserve the autonomy of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. But I stand on a different footing from my colleague—with all due respect to him.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is there anything in the bill to indicate what shall be done with the yards and docks?

Mr. McADOO. If my colleague will offer an amendment to provide for preserving the autonomy of that bureau, or the making of a division which shall have charge of that subject, his proposition shall have my support; but I will not imperil what I consider a great public measure, framed in the interest of genuine reform, by any captious objection even on behalf of that bureau. I am honored by the friendship of many of the able officers who preside over these various bureaus, but even great respect and much friendship will not deter me from performing a public duty.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Certainly my colleague does not regard it as "captious" criticism to suggest that this bill omits to provide for one great function.

Mr. McADOO. It will come under the general head of the bureau of material, construction, and repair.

Mr. BOUTELLE. There is nothing to indicate that.

Mr. McADOO. That is where it will naturally go. There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that under a fair construction of this bill matters relating to yards and docks will fall within the province of that bureau having control of the building of ships in the shop and in the dock. My only objection was that I did not wish to have it so.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not wish to interrupt my colleague, but do you not under this bill depend upon the Secretary of the Navy to use his authority to assign the functions connected with yards and docks to one of these bureaus?

Mr. McADOO. There is no doubt, from any fair reading of the bill, that such matters will go to the Bureau of Material, Construction, and Repair; that is undoubtedly where the Secretary will send them.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The question I have asked was intended as preliminary to this further question: if, under this bill, you are going to depend upon the exercise by the Secretary of the Navy of his authority in assigning functions, is not the Secretary, under the law as it stands to-day, fully panoplied and empowered to assign the functions of every one of these bureaus according to his own judgment?

Mr. McADOO. I think not. I think that where the law provides a number of bureaus, the Secretary is obliged, so far as possible, to assign to those bureaus the subjects which naturally belong to them.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I refer my colleague to the general order of Secretary Hunt, in which he specifically assigns the functions of the different bureaus.

Mr. McADOO. Well, that was Secretary Hunt's opinion; probably it was never contested, and no issue raised.

Another objection stated in the minority report, if I have understood it correctly, is that all the trouble can be obviated by giving to the Secretary of the Navy an assistant. I have found what I must say was a Saul-like conversion on the part of my very able friend from Maine to the idea of increasing the number of secretaries. In the minority report it is stated with great force that there should be an Assistant Secretary, and the opinion of the late Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Chandler, is cited in that behalf. But, sir, with the bureau system provided for in this bill, with this concentration and consolidation, but without such great centralization as might interfere with the proper authority of the Secretary of the Navy, there will be no need of an Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

If the gentleman will give his vote for this bill, by which these bureaus of the Navy Department are concentrated, by which the Secretary of the Navy gets efficient aid, by which he can consult with the proper officers as to his movements in connection with naval matters, by which his hands can be held up, by which the Navy can be rebuilt, by which the service can be regenerated, by which this branch of the Government itself can be reformed, he will have no need of an assistant Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does my colleague propose to accomplish that by a change from eight bureaus to six?

Mr. McADOO. The concentration proposed by this bill, with the council provided whereby the Secretary of the Navy at any time can gather round him the heads of these various bureaus, by which he can get from their wisdom and experience the advice he seeks, by which he can direct his great Department——

Mr. BOUTELLE. No law is needed for that.

Mr. McADOO. With that concentration you will remove from him a great deal of the care and responsibility and work of detail which is now imposed upon him, and it can then be done without incurring the necessity for any assistant secretary.

Why, Mr. Chairman, that is the argument advanced by the Secretary himself; that is, that the head of a vast establishment of the Government, from whom it is demanded by the people a respectable and efficient American Navy shall be built, if we only will so consolidate and concentrate the bureaus and powers of the great naval establishment, he will be so far freed from minor work of detail as to be able to give the best effort of his intellect, as well as the whole of his time, to executing a true policy in the construction of a new navy.

The gentleman from Maine read from the report of the naval commission signed by Commodore Luce. If there could be any stronger indictment, if there could be any more vivid statement of the evils and abuses of the present system than that report, I do not know of it. Let me read from it.

To a proper understanding of the subject, it should be stated, that the present wasteful extravagance in employing so great an excess of non-producers, and the inefficient system of doing business which has for years past been steadily increasing in our navy-yards, is but the natural outgrowth of the constitution of the Navy Department itself. There can be no manner of doubt of this. Each navy-yard is made up of a number of separate and comparatively independent establishments, little principalities, as it were, each owing allegiance to its own sovereign, the chief of the bureau to which it belongs. The heads of departments of a navy-yard have extensive and responsible duties and a large patronage, and are naturally jealous of the interference of any one but their own chiefs.

Thus each department has been gradually building itself up so as to be independent of all other departments, and is constantly striving to do all its own work. Each of the principal departments has its own body of artisans, its own machinery, its own steam-generators, and its own peculiar method of doing business. As an illustration, we take from official "schedule of wages" (Form 9) of civil engineer's office the following ratings: Boiler-makers, boiler-makers' helper, calkers, coopers, cabinet-makers, core-makers, ship-joiners, ship-carpenters, machinists, machinists' helpers, molders, oakum-pickers, and pattern-makers—a little ship-yard in itself.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the logic of the present system would lead to the creation of eight distinct establishments.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask my colleague would it be possible to repair a ship without the interposition of every one of those mechanics?

Mr. McADOO. I ask the gentleman from Maine in return, whether it would not be better to build our ships with one great department, with one official head, responsible for all that is to be done.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I think so.

Mr. McADOO. And responsible for all pertaining to it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is the system I am advocating.

Mr. McADOO. So that you shall not have duplicate sets of coopers and caulkers, but that you shall have instead one great department, presided over by an intelligent head, and its efforts directed to the building of efficient naval vessels.

Let me read further from the report:

In this way it has come that some of our yards are filled up with machinery far beyond their actual needs, and it is no exaggeration to say that there is to-day enough machinery of various kinds in either New York or Boston yard to do the work of its own particular class of the entire Navy during peace. We habitually speak of a private ship-yard as a "plant;" but each of our national ship-yards is a segregation of "plants," each having its own separate organization, and each its own internal regulations. Many illustrations might be given to show how, through the want of concert of action among these several "plants," useless and vexatious delays occur, to say nothing of the waste of time and of public money due to such diffusion.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I know that my colleague desires to be entirely candid in his statement; I therefore wish to ask him whether it is not a fact to his own personal knowledge that the recommendations in that report have been already carried out under the present bureau system?

Mr. McADOO. As a matter of fact it is impossible to carry them out under that system.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That seems to be a sufficient answer.

Mr. McADOO. It is true that under the orders of the present Secretary of the Navy he has sought to bring about the reforms, so far as he can under the present system; but as a result of that experiment to my own knowledge within a recent date he has admitted that it can not be done, and therefore to enable him to do so he has asked Congress to pass this provision of law to carry on the good work.

Mr. BOUTELLE. When did he ask it?

Mr. McADOO. In his last annual report.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have in my desk a circular issued by the Secretary of the Navy within a few weeks in which he has exercised the entire power and authority necessary to accomplish the results.

Mr. BUCK. But if my colleague will permit me, in his annual report he recommends the passage of this bill.

Mr. McADOO. There is no doubt of the attitude of the Secretary of the Navy. He came from civil life to this position. As he states in that report, and I think myself it is a most excellent point, the evils and abuses which had grown up under former administrations had not attracted the attention of his predecessors, who had become accustomed to them as a matter of routine, while on the contrary they appear to a stranger with a great deal of force; and in his report, acting upon these impressions, he asked Congress that there might be a concentration of the business of the Navy Department by the passage of this bill. He has followed that request this year by a similar application.

I do not wish to weary the gentleman from Maine and others by reading from that report. It has been read here already in the course of the debate. He has, however, in the interim very properly undertaken to carry out under the present law the system of concentration so far as the law will allow him. I will allow that the gentleman from Maine has seen the circular.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And is it not being carried into effect? I ask my colleague as a matter of fact if he understands the Secretary of the Navy has abandoned the purpose of effecting the reforms he suggested under the present system?

Mr. McADOO. I answer the gentleman once for all: The Secretary of the Navy has attempted to carry out the reforms so far as the present law will allow him. He is now estopped, and will be estopped, unless this bill is passed. If the bill is passed, then the work of concentration will go on, not otherwise.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I must beg pardon of my colleague for again interrupting him to say that my opinion is that the Secretary of the Navy is now carrying out in full detail the very work of consolidating the corps of supply under one head.

Mr. McADOO. So far as the law will allow him, I admit.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And fully.

Mr. McADOO. I do not wish to detain the committee, nor is it necessary to read from the various official sources to show the present condition of our naval system, or to show the results—the evils—of this bureaucratic management which now prevails in the naval establishment. They are apparent to the House and the country. The question is a very simple one. The House has presented to it a practical business proposition. In the carrying out of that idea it may be true that some personal interest will be injured. For myself, I do not wish to do injustice to any officer of the Navy, be he high or low in rank; but as a representative of the people, and one of the trustees of their interests on this floor, regardless of personal considerations, gain, or pain—regardless of who, in the personnel in the Navy, may have his authority curtailed, or his emoluments cut off, or his ambitions checked, I insist, sir, that it is the duty of this House to hold up the hands of the Secretary of the Navy in carrying out one of the greatest works of reform that has ever been attempted in connection with any Government establishment.

How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 18 minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. McADOO. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] desires to occupy the floor, and I will yield to him the remainder of the time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Before that, if my colleague will permit me, I wish to ask him a question, as this is entirely new to me. I would like to know how long these abuses, which it is now proposed to remedy, have existed?

Mr. McADOO. Since 1842. They have been growing steadily since their infancy, until now they have attained ripe manhood. They have never had a defender until now. They have had an array of critics, but not a solitary defender upon the floor of Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN. When did the first legislative attempt to remedy the evils take place?

Mr. McADOO. So far as I know, this is the first time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It seems to be a very late awakening to a gigantic evil.

Mr. McADOO. My colleague, I am sure, is entirely honest, and I know he is asking simply for the purpose of obtaining the best information upon the subject.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Certainly.

Mr. McADOO. If he will read the official report of the late Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Chandler, if he will read the findings of the naval commission and reports of the heads of the bureaus, as well as the annual report of the present Secretary of the Navy, then my colleague, being an honest and intelligent man, will be so utterly convinced of the importance of this legislation that he will vote for the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That was not my question. It was this: When was the first legislative attempt made to remedy this evil? I am informed that it was not till this bill was presented. I would like to know why it is, no earlier legislative attempt has been made to remedy these evils if they exist and in such magnitude as my colleague has portrayed this day.

Mr. McADOO. I presume the people in charge have temporized with these evils.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But I speak of legislative attempts.

Mr. McADOO. They may have attempted to remedy the evils to some extent under existing law, but that has been hopeless.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But this is the first bill reported by any Naval Committee on this subject.

Mr. McADOO. So far as I know it is.

I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McADOO] has fifteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HERBERT. Before the committee rises I desire to ask the gentlemen who are opposing the bill if we can not agree now on some limit to the discussion. I would like to have an agreement of that kind made before moving that the committee rise. What does the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] say?

Mr. GOFF. What does the chairman of the committee say?

Mr. HERBERT. On our side we do not want more than an hour and a half.

Mr. GOFF. And we do not want to take less than that against the bill.

Mr. HERBERT. Will you be satisfied with that?

Mr. GOFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. HERBERT. It is understood, then, that this general debate will be closed within three hours. With that understanding, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. An hour and a half being allowed to each side.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection it will be ordered that all general debate on this bill shall be limited to three hours, an hour and a half to those in favor of the bill, and an hour and a half to those opposing it. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7635) to consolidate certain bureaus of the Department of the Navy, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

BRIDGE OVER MISSISSIPPI AT DUBUQUE.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10412) to authorize the construction of a high wagon and foot-passenger bridge over the Mississippi between the city of East Dubuque, in the State of Illinois, and the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. HOISINGTON.

Mr. HITT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10413) for the relief of William H. Hoisington, son of Capt. Job Hoisington; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 362) granting a pension to James H. King;

A bill (S. 838) granting an increase of pension to General Benjamin F. Kelly;

A bill (S. 1333) for the relief of William H. Randle, of Nashville, Tenn.;

A bill (S. 1660) granting a pension to Samuel E. Tracy;

A bill (S. 1826) granting a pension to Andrew J. Burrell;

A bill (S. 1852) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane R. McQuaide;

A bill (S. 1897) granting a pension to Alexander Trimble;

A bill (S. 1958) granting an increase of pension to Addison A. Jackson;

A bill (S. 2149) granting an increase of pension to Herman Baumhager;

A bill (S. 2269) granting a pension to William Dickens; and

A bill (S. 2372) for the relief of Mary McMahon.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BOYLE: Petition of citizens of Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania, for the passage of an act for the relief of Mrs. Rebecca Brougher—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WILSON: Petition of Band of Hope (84 members), of Independence, Preston County, West Virginia, for the enactment of laws to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, the Territories, and the Capitol building—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 7, 1887.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Mississippi River Commission in regard to the river and harbor act of August 5, 1886; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF PUBLIC PRINTER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the annual report of the Public Printer, which, if there be no objection, will be referred to the Committee on Printing. There being large accompanying documents the question of printing will be referred also.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of business men of Dayton, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of what is known as the Reagan bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SAWYER presented the petition of the Business Men's Club, of Kenosha, Wis., praying for the passage of the interstate-commerce bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of the Wisconsin State Grange, praying for the passage of the Hatch bill, providing for agricultural experiment-stations, the interstate-commerce bill, a bill restricting the sale of public lands to actual settlers, and a bill making the Commissioner of Agriculture a Cabinet officer; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAWLEY. I present resolutions adopted by farmers of Connecticut in State Grange assembled, favoring the passage of what is known as the Hatch bill, or the bill introduced in the Senate by Mr. GEORGE, for the establishment of agricultural experiment-stations. I move that the resolutions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present a petition of the Upper Iowa Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, composed of 230 ministers and representing 21,000 church members, praying for the enactment of such measures as will enable the officers of the law to suppress all efforts to persecute and drive out the Chinese, and to secure to them, wherever they may be in our wide domain, the same protection afforded to all other persons in "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and especially that the indemnity bill now pending before Congress be passed without delay. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITTHORNE presented the petition of Louise Paul, widow of the late Brig. Gen. Gabriel R. Paul, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TELLER. I present a petition signed by William Steinway, J. B. Simpson, and 203 other prominent citizens of New York, praying that the Secretary of War be authorized to contract with Charles Stoughton and his associates for the entire work of improving the Harlem River in New York. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Milton J. Watkins, late a private in Company B, Eleventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, praying for the enactment of a law extending the time for filing pension claims; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of Samuel Hutchinson and other citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the reduction of internal taxes as rapidly as the condition of the Treasury will allow; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 362) granting a pension to James H. King;

A bill (S. 838) granting an increase of pension to General Benjamin F. Kelly;

A bill (S. 1333) for the relief of William H. Randle, of Nashville, Tenn.;

A bill (S. 1660) granting a pension to Samuel E. Tracy;

A bill (S. 1826) granting a pension to Andrew J. Burrell;

A bill (S. 1852) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane R. McQuaide;

A bill (S. 1897) granting a pension to Alexander Trimble;

A bill (S. 1958) granting an increase of pension to Addison A. Jackson;

A bill (S. 2149) granting an increase of pension to Herman Baumhager;

A bill (S. 2269) granting a pension to William Dickens; and

A bill (S. 2372) for the relief of Mary McMahon.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted ten amendments intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEWELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Post-Office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF FUNERAL EXPENSES.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer a resolution and ask unanimous consent that it may be considered now.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committees and officers of the Senate in arranging for and attending the funerals of ex-President Arthur, deceased, and of the late Senator of the United States A. F. PIKE, deceased; also, the actual and necessary expenses of the funeral of the late Senator of the United States J. A. LOGAN, deceased, upon vouchers audited and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution at this time, notwithstanding the terms of the rule. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

FLORIDA LAND FORFEITURE.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolutions, which were read:

Resolved, That the grant approved May 17, 1856, granting lands to the State of Florida for the construction of a line of railroad from Fernandina, Fla., to Tampa, Fla., and from the Saint Johns River, Florida, to Pensacola, Fla., should be forfeited as to all lands not earned before the time fixed in the act for the expiration of the grant, namely: ten years from the date of the approval of the act in May, 1856; and that the said lands so forfeited shall revert to the United States and be subject to homestead settlement, reserving to all actual settlers the right to 160 acres of land, and the right to enter, at the price of $1.25 per acre, 80 acres of land where they have purchased the same or the improvements on it; and that the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to report a bill to the Senate to this effect.

2. Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be instructed to bring suit through the district attorneys of the United States for an injunction against all corporations, or their agents, attempting to sell, or advertise for sale, the lands of the United States embraced in any grants made to the States or railroad companies while bills for the forfeiture of the same are pending before Congress as to all grants that have been recommended by the committees of either House of Congress to be forfeited.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the resolutions lie upon the table, and I give notice that I shall call them up for the purpose of submitting some remarks thereon and asking for their consideration at an early day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will lie upon the table.

REAR-ADMIRAL CARTER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," the Calendar is now in order. The first case on the Calendar will be reported under the 8th rule.

The bill (S. 729) for the relief of Rear-Admiral Carter was announced as first in order.

Mr. ALLISON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over under objection.

Mr. ALLISON subsequently said: At the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill (S. 729).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn, and the bill will be read.

The bill was read, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider it. It proposes to give Rear-Admiral Samuel P. Carter the pay and compensation of a rear-admiral on the retired-list from and after the date of his promotion on the retired-list to the rank of rear-admiral.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. BLACKBURN December 15, 1886, which was printed in the RECORD of December 18, 1886.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have some papers from the Navy Department showing the state of the retired rear-admirals who have been promoted to the retired-list from commodores, and the compensations that are given to them, which show rather an incongruous and irregular and perhaps an improper state of things. I should be glad to have this bill go over until I can bring the papers here and call the attention of the Senate to them.

Although something very like this, and perhaps worse, has been done in one or two instances, it is open to great question whether it is right as a matter of general principle and of general practice to do this thing. With every good wish for Admiral Carter, who is a very gallant man, I should be glad to have the bill go over until we can look into it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made the bill goes over under the rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to its staying on the rule-eight Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will retain its place on the Calendar, without prejudice.

THEOPHILUS FISK MILLS.

The bill (S. 2023) providing for the payment of $2,500 to Theophilus Fisk Mills, for executing a model and design for an equestrian statue of the late General John A. Rawlins, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator who has special knowledge of the bill is the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES]. When it was reached before it went over on his request, on the ground that the papers were absent; and I think it had better go over now, without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over, without prejudice.

EXECUTIVE SESSIONS WITH OPEN DOORS.

The next business on the Calendar was the resolution submitted by Mr. RIDDLEBERGER April 12, 1886, in relation to the consideration of business in open session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, in the absence of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] the resolution will be passed over.

Mr. HOAR. I think the resolution may as well be dismissed from the Calendar at this time. The subject has been voted upon and a similar resolution has been indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] being absent, it is suggested that the resolution go over. The next case on the Calendar will be reported.

GEORGE W. SAULPAW.

The consideration of the bill (S. 474) for the relief of George W. Saulpaw was resumed as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to George W. Saulpaw $7,000, in full compensation for his steamer Alfred Robb, taken by the United States for the use of the Government during the late rebellion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. MORRILL. It is the same bill that has passed as many, I think, as three times in the Senate heretofore.

Mr. HOAR. The report was read a few weeks ago.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARINE HOSPITAL SERVICE.

The bill (S. 780) to regulate appointments in the Marine Hospital Service of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. GORMAN. Let that bill go over. I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

ADJUSTMENT OF STATE CLAIMS.

The consideration of the bill (S. 309) to settle and adjust the claims of any State for expenses incurred by it in defense of the United States was resumed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the bill has been heretofore considered as in Committee of the Whole and the amendments acted upon.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 11) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories was announced as next in order.

Mr. TELLER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under objection.

ILLEGAL TONNAGE DUES.

The consideration of the bill (S. 1651) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make final adjustment of claims of certain foreign steamship companies arising from the illegal exaction of tonnage dues was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

The bill (S. 778) to equalize the bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war for the Union was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is an exceedingly important bill. It is quite a lengthy bill and there is a report in the case. I do not think it can be considered in the morning hour under the five-minute rule, and therefore, to save time, I ask that it be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over under the rule.

JOHN M'NAUGHTON.

The bill (H. R. 1877) for the relief of John McNaughton was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill having been reported adversely, it will be considered as objected to, and will go over.

Mr. CAMERON. Why can it not be considered at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator desires it, the bill will be considered as it comes up in order. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John McNaughton, of Gervais, Scioto County, Ohio, the pay and allowances due said John McNaughton for services rendered the United States as second lieutentant of Company G, First Regiment of West Virginia Cavalry Volunteers, from the 16th day of August, A. D. 1863, to the 5th day of February, A. D. 1864.

Mr. HARRIS. I thought that was a case reported adversely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] asks that the bill be considered, and under the rule it must be considered unless objected to.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that it go over. There is an adverse report.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, the objection to the contrary notwithstanding.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. CAMERON. There is a minority report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The views of the minority will be read.

The Secretary read the following views of the minority, submitted by Mr. CAMERON May 17, 1886:

The undersigned begs leave to dissent from the report of the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs on the bill (H. R. 1877) for the relief of John McNaughton.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John McNaughton, of Gervais, Scioto County, Ohio, the pay and allowances due said John McNaughton for services rendered the United States as second lieutenant of Company G, First Regiment of West Virginia Cavalry Volunteers, from the 16th day of August, A. D. 1863, to the 5th day of February, A. D. 1864.

This bill has received the favorable consideration of the House Committee on War Claims, has passed the House of Representatives, and was referred to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs.

The undersigned, having been appointed the subcommittee to examine and report upon this bill, after full and due consideration of all the circumstances concerning it, is satisfied that it is meritorious, and that Congress in all justice and equity ought to pass the bill and grant the relief asked for.

The merits of this case are very briefly set forth in the report of the House Committee on War Claims, as follows:

"John McNaughton, now of Gervais, Scioto County, Ohio, was enrolled as a private, Company G, First Virginia Cavalry Volunteers, on the 14th day of August, A. D. 1861, and was discharged, as first sergeant of said company, on the 15th day of August, A. D. 1863, for promotion to second lieutenant of said company. He was commissioned as second lieutenant of said company on the 12th day of August, A. D. 1863, by the governor of West Virginia, and was assigned to duty, and served as such until the 5th day of February, A. D. 1864. As soon as his duties in the field permitted he applied to the proper officer for muster, but his application was refused on the ground that his company did not have the requisite number of men, under General Orders No. 182, Adjutant-General's Office, series of 1863, to entitle it to a second lieutenant. Notwithstanding he had been mustered out as an enlisted man, and had been refused muster as lieutenant, yet he was held to service without pay, rations, or clothing until February 5, 1864, and during all that time performed service as second lieutenant. Since then he made application to the proper department for pay, but his claim was rejected because there was no law governing his case.

"In view of these facts the committee recommends the passage of this bill for his relief."

The case of Lieutenant McNaughton is unlike the many bills of a somewhat similar character which the Senate Committee on Military Affairs have reported adversely at this session, in that he was commissioned a second lieutenant by the governor of West Virginia, and performed the duties of that rank, but received neither pay, rations, nor clothing for his services, either as a second lieutenant or an enlisted man, during the period of five months. The Secretary of War, in a letter to the undersigned, recognizing the justice of the case, says "that although McNaughton appears to be equitably entitled to relief, such relief can only be afforded him by special legislation." The letter of the Secretary of War and the report of the Adjutant-General are hereunto attached.

There is abundant, undisputed, and satisfactory proof that McNaughton performed the services of the rank of second lieutenant as claimed, as will appear from the following:

HEADQUARTERS FIRST VIRGINIA CAVALRY,
Hartwood Church, Va., August 25, 1863.

Lieutenant MCNAUGHTON: You will report at these headquarters to-morrow at 7 o'clock a. m., to take command of twenty men from third squadron, fitted for picket duty.

By order of Major Capehart.

W. W. WILSON,
Lieutenant and Acting Adjutant, First Virginia Cavalry.

[Special Order No. 146.]

HEADQUARTERS CAVALRY CORPS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
August 30, 1863.

The following-named enlisted men are hereby discharged, to enable them to accept commissions, to take effect from date set opposite their names:

* * * * * * * *

First Sergeant John McNaughton, First Virginia Cavalry, second lieutenant from August 12, 1863.

* * * * * * * * *

By command of Major-General Pleasonton.

A. J. COHEN,
Acting Adjutant-General.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST VIRGINIA CAVALRY, August 31, 1863.

Lieut. J. MCNAUGHTON: You are hereby detailed as officer of the guard for to-morrow (September 1) to report at guard mounting.

By order of Col. N. P. Richmond.

W. W. WILSON,
Lieutenant and Acting Adjutant.

FAIRFAX COURT-HOUSE, VA., October 18, 1863.

SIR: You will please assign Lieut. John McNaughton, Lieutenant Malone, and Lieutenant Haug to duty with their companies, and all will be right, and you will cause them to be regularly reported on the morning report.

* * * * * * *

Your friend,

CHAS. E. CAPEHART,
Major, First Virginia Cavalry.

Maj. HARRY FARABEE,
Commanding First Virginia Cavalry.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST VIRGINIA CAVALRY,
New Creek, W. Va., December 28, 1863.

Lieut. John McNaughton has permission to be absent from camp for twenty-four hours, for the purpose of going to Cumberland, Md., to be mustered into the United States service.

CHAS. E. CAPEHART,
Major, Commanding Regiment.

CAMP FIRST VIRGINIA CAVALRY,
Stephensburg, Va., September 18, 1863.

To whom it may concern:

I certify that John McNaughton, formerly first sergeant of Company G, First Virginia Cavalry, was promoted to second lieutenant in said company the 14th day of August, 1863, and has been doing duty as such to the present date.

WILLIAM ST. CLAIR,
First Lieutenant Commanding Company G, First Virginia Cavalry.

The above-named sergeant was recommended by me for second lieutenant in Company G, First Virginia Cavalry, for meritorious conduct in the late campaign in Maryland and Pennsylvania, and received his commission as such to date 12th August, 1863. I certify that the above-named officer has performed the duties of second lieutenant, Company G, First Virginia Cavalry, from the 16th day of August, 1863.

CHAS. E. CAPEHART,
Major Commanding Regiment.

The above evidence shows conclusively that McNaughton was mustered out of service as first sergeant by his superior officers for the purpose of accepting a commission as second lieutenant, was recognized by his fellow officers as second lieutenant, and did guard and picket duty in that capacity.

As soon as his duties in the field permitted, Lieutenant McNaughton applied to the proper officer for muster, but that officer refused to muster him for the reason that his company had not the legal number of men to entitle it to a second lieutenant. He was afterward commissioned as a first lieutenant by the governor of West Virginia, and although he repeatedly asked to be mustered, was refused, but was required to continue on duty as a second lieutenant.

He was thus placed in the peculiar position of being neither an enlisted man, an officer, nor civilian, as he was held for service and not allowed to take advantage of his discharge as first sergeant or his commission as second lieutenant, but at the same time was granted neither pay, clothes, nor rations.

The undersigned sincerely believes that this is a case of hardship. Here was a soldier who honestly and faithfully served his country in the hour of peril, and is denied five months' pay for that service which he justly earned, and Congress has no right to take advantage of a technical quibble and withhold compensation from him which the War Department says he is "equitably entitled to," and if there is any fair and valid reason why he should not receive his pay the undersigned fails to comprehend it.

In view of all the circumstances above set forth, the undersigned respectfully recommends that the Senate will pass the bill, notwithstanding the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs are adverse to it.

J. D. CAMERON.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, April 13, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 27th ultimo, inclosing, for the views of this Department, (H. R. 1877) Forty-ninth Congress, first session, "An act for the relief of John McNaughton," late of Company G, First West Virginia Cavalry, with the accompanying papers in the case. In reply I beg to inclose herewith a report from the Adjutant-General's Office of the 7th instant, which contains a statement of the military service of John McNaughton, and from which it will be seen that his assignment to duty as second lieutenant in the First West Virginia Cavalry was in violation of the act of March 3, 1863, and General Order No. 182, of 1863, based thereon, Company G being, during the period mentioned in the bill below the minimum number. He was commissioned second lieutenant August 12, 1862, and appears to have rendered service from that date to February 5, 1864; and although he appears to be equitably entitled to relief, such relief can only be afforded him by special legislation.

The bill inclosed in your letter and its accompanying papers are herewith returned, as requested.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. C. ENDICOTT, Secretary of War.

Hon. J. D. CAMERON,
Of the Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 7, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith communication (with inclosures) of Hon. J. D. CAMERON, of Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate, inclosing papers in support of a claim for the recognition of John McNaughton as a second lieutenant First West Virginia Cavalry Volunteers, together with House bill No. 1877, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, for his relief, and requesting on behalf of said committee to be furnished with whatever information the files of this office may afford relative thereto, and to report as follows:

The records of this office show that John McNaughton was enrolled August 14, 1861, and mustered into service, and appointed sergeant Company G, First West Virginia Cavalry Volunteers, September 14, 1861, to serve three years.

He was promoted first sergeant November 1, 1862, and is borne as of that grade, present for duty, to April 30, 1863.

On roll for May, June, July, and August, 1863 (four months' muster roll), he is reported second lieutenant, present, with remark "Promoted from first sergeant to second lieutenant August 12, 1863, vice Swintzel, killed; was assigned to duty as lieutenant August 15, 1863." For September and October, 1863, "second lieutenant, present; discharged as first sergeant for promotion August 12, 1863; performed duty as second lieutenant since August 16, 1863, to October 31, 1863." For November and December, 1863, second lieutenant, present; "discharged as first sergeant for promotion August 12, 1863; performed duty as second lieutenant since August 16, 1863, to December 31, 1863." For January and February, 1864, second lieutenant, "absent on recruiting service."

Regimental returns for the months of January and February, 1864, are not on file.

Muster-out roll of non-veterans of the company (next on file), dated November 21, 1864, reports him "promoted to second lieutenant August 15, 1863; could not be mustered as such; mustered out as sergeant, to date August 15, 1863; relieved from duty by Secretary of War."

The records further show that Company G, First West Virginia Cavalry Volunteers, was below the minimum number during the period mentioned in the inclosed bill, and had two commissioned officers, a captain and a first lieutenant.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the assignment of John McNaughton to duty as second lieutenant Company G, August 16, 1863, was in violation of the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1863, and General Order No. 182 of 1863, based thereon, and that he continued to perform said duties to a date that can not be definitely determined, in consequence of the incomplete condition of the records of his regiment.

It appears, however, from the evidence submitted that on February 5, 1864, the adverse decision of the Department on an application for his muster as a second lieutenant was transmitted to him by Brigadier-General Kelly, commanding department West Virginia, and it is believed he severed his connection with the First West Virginia Cavalry Volunteers on that date.

Although Mr. McNaughton was commissioned second lieutenant First West Virginia Cavalry Volunteers August 12, 1863, and appears to have rendered service as of that grade from August 16, 1863, to February 5, 1864, the relief to which he is equitably entitled can only be afforded by special legislation.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. KELTON,
Acting Adjutant-General.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. COCKRELL. On the 3d of March, 1863, Congress passed a law requiring that thereafter no promotions should be made or appointments to vacancies in regiments or companies where the regiments or companies were below a certain minimum. During the period between that and June, 1863, and afterward there were large numbers of officers who were commissioned by the governors of their respective States when their regiments and companies were below the minimum. The United States authorities refused to recognize those commissions or to muster in the officers to their new or promoted positions.

The Committee on Military Affairs has uniformly refused to remove the limitation of that law. If the Committee on Military Affairs were to recommend or if the Senate were to pass a bill to remove that limitation it would involve hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars.

As a rule, and with scarcely an exception, when these promotions were made they were made of a second lieutenant to first lieutenant, or of a first lieutenant to captain, or of a captain to major, or of a major to lieutenant-colonel, or of a lieutenant-colonel to colonel, or of a sergeant to second lieutenant; and as an almost universal rule the officers or sergeants continued to draw the pay of the positions they were in until they were recognized in their higher positions.

When this case was before the Committee on Military Affairs I did not see the distinction between it and the principle heretofore asserted by the committee, that they would not allow the increased pay to a sergeant or to a second lieutenant or a first lieutenant or a captain for a promotion attempted to be made in violation of law. We have uniformly adhered to that rule, but here is a case which is entirely different. Here this sergeant was absolutely mustered out of the service as a sergeant, and as the report says (and I presume there is no question of that; the records show it), as a sergeant he drew no pay or compensation whatever and yet performed under a commission which was not legal the duties of a second lieutenant.

It would be a very great injustice to this soldier to deprive him of all pay. If he had continued in the position of sergeant and had drawn the pay of a sergeant then the rule established by the Military Committee would have applied to his case, and he would not have been entitled under our rule to any compensation; but as he was deprived of the pay of a sergeant by being mustered out and then deprived of any pay of a lieutenant, the duties of which office he was performing, because he could not be mustered in, I believe very frankly and candidly that he is entitled to some relief, and therefore I wish to place myself upon the record as favoring the bill if properly modified.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to have the Senator from Missouri explain why it is, if this bill is to be passed, that a similar bill which has been before the committee now for some time for the relief of Mr. Huddleston has not been considered by that committee.

I wish to say further, however, that the principle applied to this bill has been denied in numerous cases. While I was a member of that committee this matter was thoroughly discussed with a view to the perfection of a bill such as was subsequently passed. If this bill is passed it opens the door to very many thousand cases, I will not say cases having no equity, but cases which will involve long investigation, large expenditure of money, and a thorough overhauling of the entire official military service of the United States during the war of the rebellion.

There are at least fifty cases which have occurred within my own knowledge which are precisely similar to this in principle, and almost similar to it in point of literal fact; but the Committee on Military Affairs adopted as a fundamental rule that no commission to a place which was not legally vacant at the time should carry with it any pay or emolument.

This bill violates that rule. This person was commissioned to a place which had no existence. Similar cases are numbered by thousands, and I think perhaps by even tens of thousands, where the governors of States with no responsibility upon them, because the commission carried with it nothing except the right to be mustered, issued commissions to officers where there were no vacancies. I know hundreds of cases myself, I was going to say. In fact, I think I know that there were some seven or eight different regiments in which every officer originally appointed would have the same claim to pay that this person would have. Yet they never have been paid, and can not be paid under the existing state of the law.

I should like to have the Military Committee adopt one rule or the other, and give to the officers of the United States Army or persons who were under commissions in the United States Army and rendered service the same chance that is proposed to be given to Mr. McNaughton. I imagine that when they come to frame that general rule which ought to be framed, if we are to enter upon this legislation at all, they will find that it involves very great difficulty. Nothing was more familiar to all persons who knew of what was occurring in the service than that men served in a rank to which they had not been commissioned, persons serving as first lieutenants who were commissioned merely as second lieutenants and doing the duties of that rank; persons serving as brigadier-generals who were only colonels and sometimes only majors, and persons serving as major-generals who were only brigadier-generals, doing the duty of the rank above that for which they had pay. The passage of this bill establishes the principle of paying all of them, and they amount to as many as the entire number of the officers of the United States Army during the war.

In addition to that, as I said before, many thousands of persons were commissioned to places which they could not fill, because there was no legal vacancy, because, which is precisely the case of this man, there was no such office as that of second lieutenant of the company in which he purported to serve, because under the law, by reason of the diminution in the numbers of the company, that office lapsed, it had no existence. The Governor of West Virginia might just as well have commissioned a man a major-general and sent him out on the top of one of the highest hills in that State and kept him there during the entire period of war, and he would have had just as much of an equitable claim to pay as this man has to the pay of this particular rank.

I do not mean to say that there is no equity of some kind; there is in all these cases, but it ought to be an equity which is recognized by a general bill which will put them all on the same footing; and unless the committee is prepared for the report of such a bill as that upon due investigation, it seems to me we ought not to enter upon this legislation.

I have a bill in my hand which I introduced in 1885 for the relief of Elkanah Huddleston. It has been before the Committee on Military Affairs since that date. The bill is in language as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Elkanah Huddleston on the rolls as first lieutenant of Company A, First Regiment Kansas Colored Infantry Volunteers (afterward known as the Seventy-ninth Regiment United States Colored Troops), as of the date of August 1, 1862; and that the proper accounting and pay officers shall allow and pay to said Huddleston the pay and emoluments of a first lieutenant from said date until the 13th day of January, 1863, deducting any sum or sums he may have received on account of military service during said period.

That person was detailed by order of the Secretary of War, appointed by the Secretary of War as a lieutenant in the First Regiment of Kansas Colored Infantry, and did the duties of that office for months; but because he was not finally permitted to be mustered he never received any pay. While he did not have technically a commission he had a command from his superior officer, the Secretary of War, which was superior in authority to any commission issued by the governor of any State.

There are probably thirty cases of that precise kind in that one regiment alone. In nearly all the regiments that were raised in the State of Arkansas, by reason of the fact that there was no governor, persons were assigned to duty in the various offices to be filled by order of the Secretary of War, and received no pay for all the probationary period which they served, amounting many times to months in charge of recruiting stations, in performing military duty in command of detachments, &c., prior to muster, and not a single one of them ever received a dollar of pay. There was the case, too, of a large portion of the official staff of the Indian regiments that were afterward organized.

I have no doubt every one at all familiar with the service will bring to mind on reflection many cases where the equity is just as strong as in this case. What I say against this is simply that this should not be taken up and passed under the apprehension that the rule to be established here does not apply to a large number of cases, to many thousands and tens of thousands of cases even. Entering on this legislation is simply opening the door to bringing them all in. Many of them, I think, ought to come in, but they ought to come in under a rule settled by a statute and applied by the executive department, and not leave the Senate and Congress to be confronted at each session with applications for personal relief in the shape of special bills.

I am very much surprised that the Senator from Missouri, who is thoroughly posted upon these matters and who has given such thorough and exhaustive attention to them heretofore, should have committed himself to the principle of this bill, without insisting at the same time that it should be applied by means of a general law, and not in special cases alone.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am equally surprised that my good friend from Kansas did not note the absolute and broad distinction between this and the case of Lieutenant Huddleston and others to which he has referred. I stand with him unqualifiedly in his position in regard to the enforcement of the law of March 3, 1863, and have uniformly so voted upon the Committee on Military Affairs; and if any relief is extended to the class of officers coming within that law, it must be by general law. I now hold in my hand public act No. 43 of the Forty-eighth Congress, an act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces. That was passed as a general law, approved June 3, 1884, and under it a great many officers have been relieved, and the Committee on Military Affairs has uniformly reported against allowing compensation to any officer coming within the terms of this general law. Now the Senator discovers that in the case of Lieutenant Huddleston he was drawing pay and was assigned to the higher place and continued to draw the pay of the lower place.

This man McNaughton was a sergeant, but he was mustered out of the Army and was not allowed pay as a sergeant. If he had been allowed pay as a sergeant during this time the rule of the Committee on Military Affairs would have excluded him, and I should have been against the bill, in accordance with the uniform usage of the committee. But here this man has drawn no pay whatever as a sergeant or as a lieutenant. I think he ought to draw the pay of a sergeant. If he had not been mustered out he would have continued to draw the pay of a sergeant, and the Committee on Military Affairs would have been adverse to allowing the higher pay because he was drawing compensation.

The Senator has well remarked that there are millions of dollars depending on these technical questions as to whether a captain serving as major and commanding a regiment as a colonel in the temporary absence of the lieutenant-colonel shall receive the pay of the office he performed, and so as to a second lieutenant performing the duties of first lieutenant or captain, and often a sergeant performing the duties of a company commander. The Committee on Military Affairs have continuously thought that no additional compensation under any circumstances should be allowed in such cases, and I do not believe that any should be allowed. But this is an exceptional case. It is the only case during my experience on the Committee on Military Affairs that I can recall of the kind—the only solitary one. I was against the bill in full committee—voted against it—believing that it came within the class of cases referred to by the Senator from Kansas, but since I have read the report of the Secretary of War and the documents I see that I was mistaken in my view of the case, and therefore, as a matter of justice and right and equity and fair dealing, I am inclined to favor it, but it must first be amended.

Here is a soldier; he was a sergeant; he was discharged as a sergeant; he could no longer draw pay as a sergeant, but he continued in the service; he was performing the duties of a second lieutenant. He was discharged for the purpose of taking the position of second lieutenant; it was not a general discharge, but the authorities discharged him because they thought he would immediately receive his commission as a lieutenant. He was deprived of pay both as a lieutenant and as a sergeant. Under the rule of the Committee on Military Affairs, as adhered to, he ought to be paid the pay of a sergeant instead of the pay of a lieutenant, and then he would be on a perfect equality with all the cases referred to by the Senator from Kansas, and there would be no injustice done and no new rule established. If this bill established the rule that the Senator refers to, I should be against it. If this man had received pay as a sergeant during this time, I would be against it. But the man received no pay whatever, and he ought to receive either the pay of a sergeant or the pay of a lieutenant, and I think that justice and equity require that he receive in pursuance of the uniform rule and practice of the Committee on Military Affairs the pay and emoluments of a sergeant, the position he was mustered out of under the supposition that he would take the position of second lieutenant.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator then move to amend the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will. I move to amend by striking out the words giving the pay of a second lieutenant and inserting "pay of sergeant."

Mr. CAMERON. I hope that amendment will not prevail. It seems to me if this man is entitled to anything at all he is entitled to pay for the service he actually rendered. He was mustered out as a sergeant, not at his own desire or wish, but because his services were needed in a higher grade. It appeared afterwards that under the law of 1863 there were not sufficient men in the company to entitle it to a captain and a first and a second lieutenant, but at the same time he performed all the duties of second lieutenant, and if he is paid anything at all he ought to receive the pay of the rank in which he served.

The argument of the Senator from Kansas that this is going to involve a great many other cases, it seems to me is not a fair one and not an equitable one. It makes no difference that it may involve millions. If the bill is right it ought to pass; if it is wrong it ought not to pass; and it ought not to be mixed up with a hundred or a thousand other cases that are not exactly similar.

This is a peculiar case. As was stated by the Senator from Missouri, the man performed the duties of lieutenant and received neither the pay of a sergeant nor of a lieutenant, and having performed the duties of lieutenant he ought to be paid as such. It seems to me that it would be very small in the Congress of the United States to cut him down from the pay of second lieutenant to that of sergeant, simply to save $20 per month, in all $120.

Mr. PLUMB. The vital point is that there was no vacancy which the governor could lawfully commission him for; and if we are to allow this simply because the governor commissioned this man we must give the same to every man who held a governor's commission, no matter whether it was for a position that could be legally filled or not, and pay him for whatever service he rendered.

If the amendment the Senator from Missouri speaks of is adopted, that will leave the action of the Senate in this case consistent with the action of the Military Committee heretofore. Unless we are to enter on this business generally, that ought to be done. If it is I have no objection, because I should be very glad to give the committee some two or three hundred cases to act upon at once in the same line.

Mr. CAMERON. If there is any justice in the cases, they ought to go before the committee and be acted on.

Mr. PLUMB. I sent a bill there over a year ago and it has not been acted on.

Mr. CAMERON. And the Senator opposes this bill because his has not been acted on.

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all, but I do not wish to make fish of one and flesh of another.

Mr. COCKRELL. My amendment is after the word "allowances" to strike out down to "Company G," and insert in lieu thereof:

Of a first sergeant.

So as to read:

The pay and allowances of a first sergeant Company G, First Regiment West Virgina Cavalry Volunteers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 20, noes 7; no quorum voting.

Mr. CAMERON. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEWELL. The Military Committee having this case under consideration reported adversely on the bill, as they have been in the habit of doing in such cases for years. A number of similar cases have been before them, and two years ago they reported and Congress passed a general act under which officers who were commissioned and could not get mustered because their commissions had not reached them in the field or in hospital, or out-of-the-way places in the line of their duty, were permitted to be mustered back to the date of their commissions, provided there was a vacancy in the regiment at that period.

There seems to be some equity in this case. But if the Congress of the United States pass this bill, recognizing that a man who was not in the service legally, who could not be mustered in under the law, was an officer, and pays him as such, it will give us a great deal of special business in the future; it will involve thousands of cases. Recognizing the equity arising from the service of this person, I believe that the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri should prevail. The man should have something.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] generally, and not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired on all questions with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. If he were present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say that my colleaugue [Mr. GRAY] is absent, paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Beck,	Colquitt,	Hawley,	Sewell,
Berry,	Edmunds,	Maxey,	Vance,

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. The question presented to the Senate is one that I have knowledge of from many years service upon the Committee on Military Affairs. The question is presented very often, and there are cases of overwhelming equity where relief ought to be granted.

The statement made by the Senator from Kansas is entirely true within my knowledge. In Arkansas especially there were a great many cases where the equity of the case entitles the parties to relief. I have in mind one case of that sort where the company was within the legal limit and was organized, and some of its members were on detailed duty at distant stations, and therefore were not present with the company when they should have been mustered. The company was reduced below the minimum number prescribed by law, the result of which is that the claim of an officer has been rejected by the Department because his company was not of sufficient numbers to justify his commission at the time he was ready to be mustered. During all this time he was regularly assigned to duty by the department commander as a second lieutenant and responsible as such. That is a case, it seems to me, of overwhelming equity.

What I think ought to be done by the Committee on Military Affairs is to report some bill that will cover cases where the equities overwhelm and override the naked point of law.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF ERSKINE S. ALLIN.

Mr. PLATT. I ask the Senate to go back to a case which went over under objection just at the close of the last session because there was not time to consider it. It is Order of Business 967, being the bill (S. 1359). I wish to go back and have that bill taken up for consideration. It may as well be considered at this time as at any other. It is a bill which was objected to by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the consideration of the Calendar, the Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1359) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin.

Mr. COCKRELL. Can that motion be made during the regular call of the Calendar?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be made under the express terms of the rule whenever a Senator gets the floor to make it; but it can only prevail by the vote of the Senate. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some reason why we should go back and violate the rule we have been adhering to all the session. If there is any just reason why we should lay aside the call of unobjected cases and go back to take up those that have had their day once in the Senate, I should like to know it.

Mr. PLATT. Begging the indulgence of the Senate, as I suppose debate is not in order——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order.

Mr. PLATT. I will state why I think it is entirely right and proper to go back.

Here is a claim that is just as important as the claim which was last considered. It was reached on the Calendar at the close of the last session when business of a public character was pressing, and so it went over under an objection. Now, I insist that it is not fair that that bill going over in that way should not have its day in the Senate, and therefore I ask that it may be taken up at this time. I think it is as good a time as we shall have to take it up.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be placed on the Calendar in the same position as if it had not been objected to at that time.

Mr. PLATT. That is the same thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the bill be taken up by vote of the Senate it will be open to debate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1359) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin.

Mr. PLATT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Hoar,	Spooner,
Allison,	Eustis,	Manderson,	Stanford,
Berry,	Frye,	Maxey,	Teller,

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1359) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Patents with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 3, before the word "thousand" to strike out "one hundred" and insert "thirty," so as to read:

That the sum of $30,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid in equal parts to Fannie T. Allin, of Springfield, Mass., and Augusta M. Ladd, of Holyoke, Mass., respectively widow and daughter of the late Erskine S. Allin.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report in that case be read.

Mr. PLATT. Let the amendment be made.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us hear the report before we vote at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the report being called for, it will be read.

The Secretary read the following report submitted by Mr. PLATT April 28, 1886:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1359) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report:

Erskine S. Allin was master armorer at the United States armory located in Springfield. He spent about fifty years in the service of the Government at said armory. He made an invention for improvement in breech-loading fire-arms (letters patent No. 49959, dated September 19, 1865). He was not employed by the Government to make this invention, nor was it suggested to him by any Government official. It was his own invention. He need not have authorized the use of it by the United States if he had not so chosen, but he did, on the 30th day of October, 1867, execute a license to the Government to use the invention, a copy of which license is appended to this report. No compensation was paid by the Government to him for the use of the invention. He was not the first inventor of that feature of the alteration of the Springfield musket to the Springfield rifle which is known as the swinging breech-block pivoted to the barrel, swinging upward and forward, so that a fixed cartridge could be inserted in the barrel, and then closing so that a solid resistance was furnished to the recoil of the cartridge, but seems to have been the first inventor who made such feature a practical operative improvement in the alteration of muzzle-loading fire-arms to breech-loaders.

A great many improvements have since been made to his proposed method of alteration, both at the armory and by the adoption of outside inventions, which are now in use, making a perfect method of alteration. The gun known as the model of 1865 included all the devices of Allin set forth in his patent, and 5,020 Springfield muzzle-loading rifles were changed to breech-loaders by use of the devices shown in the Allin patent. Subsequent improvements, as has been intimated, were made, and the improved guns were known at the armory as the models of 1866, 1868, 1870, 1873, 1879, and 1884. The history of such improvements shows the gradual and successive approach toward the perfection of the arm as now manufactured. Of the models of 1866, 1868, 1870, 1873, 1879, and 1884, 432,873 Springfield rifles have been manufactured. All of these rifles thus made since the original 5,020 contain one feature of the Allin patent, namely, the locking device, and perhaps the mechanical equivalent of the second claim of his patent, but they also contain a large number of improvements thereon.

No settlement has ever been made by the Government with the inventors and patentees whose inventions have been appropriated by the Government in the alteration of the Springfield muzzle-loading rifle to breech-loaders. In two, and perhaps more, instances suits by patentees whose inventions had been adopted in making the perfected improvement were brought against the former superintendent of the armory, and recoveries were had.

Mr. Allin left a widow and daughter, who are without any means of support left by him, and are poor.

The letter of the Secretary of War addressed to the committee in reply to inquiries, with papers submitted by the Secretary of War, are appended to this report.

By the communication of General S.V. Benét, Chief of Ordnance, it will be seen that he considers that 10 cents per gun containing the improvement made by Mr. Erskine S. Allin would be a fair and reasonable compensation. If this rule of compensation were adopted the amount would be $43,331.56. But in view of the fact that a license was obtained by the Government from said Allin under which a large proportion of the arms to which the improvement was applied were manufactured, the committee are of the opinion that some deduction should be made from the amount recommended by the Chief of Ordnance, and recommend as an adequate compensation to the heirs of said Erskine S. Allin the payment of $30,000.

The passage of the bill referred to the committee is recommended if amended so as to make the sum named therein $30,000, and further amended by inserting after the word "of," in the ninth line, the words "improvements used in the manufacture of."

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the exhibits be read; they are an important part of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, March 1, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of the 10th and 18th ultimo, inclosing Senate bill 1359, providing for the appropriation of the sum of $100,000 for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin, who was the inventor of the Springfield breech-loading rifle-musket.

In response to your inquiries whether all or any of the essential features of the Allin patent have been or are now used in the manufacture of the Springfield rifles; how many Springfield muskets were altered to breech-loaders by use of the Allin patent alone, and if Mr. Allin had the foundation patent that appears in the improvements now in use, I beg to inclose herewith a report of the 1st instant from the Chief of Ordnance, and copies of reports from the master armorer and the commanding officer of the National Armory, Springfield, Mass., which will, it is believed, furnish the information requested, so far as the records of this Department show.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. O. H. PLATT,
Chairman Committee on Patents, United States Senate.

ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 1, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of letters from the chairman of the Senate Committee on Claims, dated 10th and 18th ultimo, inclosing Senate bill No. 1359, for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin.

These papers are herewith returned together with reports from the master armorer and the commanding officer of National Armory, dated 23d and 24th ultimo, which answer all the inquiries of Senator PLATT as far as the records of this office show.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. V. BENÉT,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

NATIONAL ARMORY,
Springfield, Mass., February 24, 1886.

SIR: In reply to your instructions of the 19th instant, inclosing two letters from the chairman of the Senate Committee on Patents, with Senate bill 1359, for the relief of the heirs of E. S. Allin, formerly master armorer of this armory, to give as full report as the records of the armory and the personal knowledge of myself, the present master armorer, and other employés of the armory can furnish, I have the honor to report, returning herewith the papers referred to above, that the records of the armory show that 5,020 Springfield muzzle-loading rifles were changed to breech-loading arms by using the Allin devices described below, and are known as the Allin alteration or model, 1865, and that 432,873 Springfield (models 1866-'68-'70-'73-'79-'83) rifles, exclusive of the aforesaid, have been manufactured since to include the 23d day of February, 1886, having at least one feature claimed in the Allin patent, No. 49959, of December 19, 1865. A copy of the license to the United States to manufacture the claims of said patent is herewith inclosed.

The claims of the Allin patent are as follows: "In this invention a hinged breech-block, lifting upward and forward, causes a slide to move back a certain distance and then liberates a spring tooth on the retractor, allowing a re-engagement on the closing of the breech. The thumb-piece of the latch which locks the breech-lock is covered by the nose of the hammer on its descent, thereby securing the safe closure of the breech before the charge can be fired."

"Claims.—(1) The combination of a solid recoil block, A, with a pinion, U, and rack, m, the first tooth, s, of which is hung on a spring, in the manner and for the purpose described. (2) Beveling the front end of recoil block at c', and forming a corresponding bevel, c, on the barrel, as and for the purpose described. (3) The projection X, in combination with the lever f and hammer v, substantially in the manner and for the purpose described."

The aforesaid 5,020 altered Springfield rifles have all the three devices claimed. The 432,843 arms aforesaid have the third or last construction claimed, and what may be considered the mechanical equivalent of the second; that is, the bevel c' on the recoil block and corresponding bevel c on the barrel do not appear at all, but the two devices, viz, in model 1866 the front end of recoil block, when closed, enters into, for a certain distance, the cartridge-head recess in the chamber of barrel behind the cartridge, and in all subsequent models the fall of the breech-block, being in the same plane with the axis of motion, that is, with the axis of the hinge-pin, the round hinge-lugs of receiver on each side project over, when the block is closed, corresponding cuts in the front end of breech-block, thus securing it from throwing an upward strain on the hinge-pin when under the action of recoil. These constructions perform the same office as the bevels aforesaid, and may, as said, be considered mechanical equivalents, though they do not at all resemble the bevels, and in respect to all models subsequent to model 1868, the location is not the same. The construction of the third claim, what is called now the firing-pin guard of the cam-latch thumb-piece, is on all the arms, as above stated, substantially as patented. I believe the above and inclosures answer specifically all the questions of the chairman of the Committee of the Senate on Patents and give a complete history of the matter as personally known here and shown by the armory records. The master armorer's views are stated in his letter of the 23d instant, herewith inclosed.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. R. BUFFINGTON,
Lieutenant-Colonel of Ordnance, Commanding.

The CHIEF OF ORDNANCE,
Washington, D. C.

NATIONAL ARMORY, Springfield, Mass., February 23, 1886.

SIR: In obedience to your instruction of even date, I have the honor to state my opinion concerning the E. S. Allin patent on fire-arms, No. 49959, September 19, 1865, as having been applied to the Springfield rifles made at this armory, as follows, to wit: The guns known as the model 1865 included all the devices as claimed in said patent. Those of the models of 1866, 1868, 1869, 1870, 1873, and 1884 include the locking device for holding the breech-block closed when in the act of firing, as stated in the Allin third claim, letter X.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SAMUEL W. PORTER, Master Armorer.

Col. A. R. BUFFINGTON,
U. S. Army, Commanding.

ORDNANCE OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 10, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to return letter of the 4th instant from the chairman Senate Committee on Patents, inclosing a bill (S. 1359) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin, inquiring "whether it is the opinion of the War Department that the heirs of Mr. Allin are entitled to compensation from the Government, and if so what would be regarded by the Department as a reasonable compensation for the invention which Mr. Allin seems to have made, so far as the same has been adopted and used by the Government," and to report.

The court of inquiry, of which Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas was president, and Generals Hancock and Terry members, and Judge-Advocate General Holt, judge-advocate, which convened in October, 1868, expressed the following opinion:

"The court is of the opinion that when a person in the military employment of the Government, either as an officer, soldier, mechanic, or laborer, devises a new and valuable improvement in any kind of military material, and with his own means makes experiments and brings to perfection his invention, there is no reason why he should not be permitted to secure to himself any pecuniary value which his invention may have by obtaining letters patent for his invention under the patent laws of the United States or of foreign countries.

"In such a case should the Government make use of the invention it is but just that it should make compensation to the patentee. Even should the Government tools, materials, and labor be used in perfecting the invention, in cases where the object for which the inventor is employed is not such as to make it his duty to devise improvements, if it be in his power to do so, the fact that the public has contributed to the invention should not be a bar to the right of the inventor to recover compensation from the Government if it makes use of his invention. It may and should be considered in determining the amount of compensation equitably due to him for the use.

"But when any person is employed for the express purpose of making experiments with a view to the discovery of improvements in the construction or manufacture of military material, and is paid for his time, and supplied with tools, machinery, materials, and labor, so that the whole expense of the experiments from which the invention results is borne by the Government, the invention, in the judgment of the court, although under our patent laws it is the legal property of the inventor, belongs, equitably, to the Government, at least to the extent that the Government should have the right to use it without further compensation to the inventor. In such case the inventor, in devising his improvement, has done only that which he was expressly employed to do, only that which he was paid by the Government to do for its benefit."

Mr. Allin was, at the time he made this invention, the master armorer of the Springfield armory. He was not "employed for the express purpose of making experiments with a view to the discovery of improvements in the construction and manufacture" of the Springfield rifle, but he did make this invention while in the employ of the Government and receiving its pay, and licensed the United States to make free use of patent granted to him. While he has no legal claim on the United States for compensation, in equity his heirs are entitled to some remuneration.

In my opinion 10 cents per gun containing his improvement would be a fair and reasonable compensation for the invention.

Of course this office does not pretend to decide on the validity of the patent, although the validity of the "locking device" used by the United States invented by Mr. Allin has never been questioned, as far as this office is aware.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. V. BENÉT,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

Official copy of copy of armory records.

A. R. BUFFINGTON,
Lieutenant-Colonel of Ordnance.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I confess that the reading of this report confuses me. I do not know whether the tax-payers of the United States have any rights, immunities, or privileges against the cormorant claims of patentees or not. I do not know what guard and protection the tax-payers have. I can not see the light in which the committee viewed this case in making a favorable report.

Now, what are the facts? Here is a master armorer in the employ of the United States, receiving a full compensation for his services and his skill; and while in that service he goes to experimenting with the labor which the United States has paid for, with the material which the United States has issued at his hands, and in the buildings and with the machinery of the United States. He makes an invention while so in the employ of the United States, with the time paid for by the United States, the labor, the machinery, and the material of the United States. The United States begins to use this patent in a very small way. This is done in 1865. Up to 1867 the United States probably used this patented device to the extent of five or six thousand muskets that were changed. The United States have, in other words, perfected his invention, and then this man, honest and just as he was, made a bill of sale, a transfer, a conveyance absolute and unqualified, to the United States of his patent and all the rights and privileges, so far as the United States was concerned, in the use of it then and for all future time. Here is the bill of sale; it is as absolute and unqualified as language can make it:

Whereas Erskine S. Allin, in the county of Hampden and State of Massachusetts, has invented certain new and useful improvements in breech-loading firearms; and

Whereas the United States has aided in developing, perfecting, and applying to practical use the said improvement—

How?

by furnishing to said Allin, at the United States armory at Springfield, Mass., the labor—

Not only his own labor, but other labor—

the labor, material, and other requisites to that end:

Now be it known that, for and in consideration of the aid aforesaid, and $1 received by me, the said Allin, I have granted, bargained, and sold, and by these presents do grant, bargain, and sell and assign to the United States of America, the right to manufacture the said improvement in all the armories and arsenals of the United States, and the right to use said improvement so manufactured everywhere, together with the right, title, and interest that I have, or may have, to said improvement under any letters patent dated December 19, 1865, or any renewal or extension thereof that have been or may be granted therefor to the extent of the grant and license aforesaid to manufacture and use said improvement.

For a full equivalent, for a full compensation according to his own honest, unbiased judgment, he sells, assigns, and transfers to the United States the absolute, unquestioned right to use this improvement; and then what? The United States officials, relying upon this conveyance, relying upon this assignment, relying upon having made full compensation for this device, then go on and alter and change and manufacture some three or four hundred thousand Springfield muskets, using only one little bit of this patented device, only one item of it. Then after this armorer is dead and in his grave we are confronted here with a claim for $100,000 against the tax-payers of the United States.

Mr. President, I fail to see that there is a glimmering of equity, much less justice or right, in this claim.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I am one of those who do not believe that the tax-payers of the United States have any objection to doing what is just and equitable and right by way of compensation, either to parties who have made inventions which the United States have used, or, if they are dead, to their representatives if they are poor and needy, especially when the Secretary of War recommends and the Chief of Ordnance recommends that a larger sum should be paid than is proposed to be paid. The bill is not for $100,000; it is for $30,000. I will state very briefly what the facts are.

Mr. Erskine S. Allin was master armorer at the Springfield Armory. He gave fifty years of his life to the service of the Government, and was paid as a master armorer was paid. While there he invented an improvement which lies at the foundation of the alteration of the Springfield musket from a muzzle-loader to a breech-loader, and although other subsequent improvements were added which make the present Springfield musket, Mr. Allin had the foundation patent, without which any of them would be useless. He did assign his invention to the Government, but the Government never paid him a cent for it, and that is found in the report. So it is not true that he received any full and adequate compensation for services in making the invention.

It was his invention. Not only Judge-Advocate-General Holt and others have so decided, but the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that an invention made under such circumstances belongs to the inventor and not to the Government. He need not have assigned it to the Government, but he did. After his death without receiving one cent of compensation, after others who had patents not so meritorious as his, which were not foundation patents, patents which could not have been used without using his, have brought suit against the officers of the Government and recovered in one instance $75,000 and in another $22,000, his wife and daughter come to Congress and ask that the Government shall make to them a fair compensation for the service which the husband and father rendered to the Government.

As I said, it is recommended by the Secretary of War, and it was recommended for a larger amount; it was recommended by the Secretary of War for $43,000 and over, and the committee made the allowance somewhat less, $30,000, a lump sum.

I want to say another thing which does not appear in this report, that the Government has sold muskets in which this improvement has been made to other countries, and made profit enough out of that operation to pay this claim three times over. I do not think it is in the mouth of the Government of the United States under the circumstances to refuse such compensation as this.

Mr. BECK. This man did bring a claim for $100,000, of which the Secretary or War says:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, March 1, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of the 10th and 18th ultimo, inclosing Senate bill 1359, providing for the appropriation of the sum of $100,000 for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin, who was the inventor of the Springfield breech-loading rifle-musket.

That is the bill.

Mr. PLATT. That was not his bill. The bill is for the relief of his heirs.

Mr. BECK. I mean that the claim was asserted for $100,000, and the committee have seen fit to bring it down to $30,000, while they say that a recommendation of $43,000 was made somewhere else, showing, to begin with, that it is simply a question of guessing at what each one thinks is equity and not what anybody asserts is right.

Mr. Allin himself, the Senator from Connecticut says, gave fifty years of his life to the Government. I suppose he gave those fifty years to its service as very many other people give such service after getting all the influence they can everywhere to get the place and keep everybody else out of it. He held on to it for fifty years and received all the pay allowed it. That is the meaning of giving that time to the Government. If he had been turned out at any time, I suppose he would have had every Senator from New England here protesting against the injustice of his being turned out of that place that he had held so long and filled so well. So there is nothing in that part of the case.

When he got a patent for this invention, a part of which the Government used, he thought it was to his interest to make a conveyance to the Government of the right to use it, and he recited why he did it. The Government he says—and he knows better than anybody else—"has aided in developing, perfecting, and applying to practical use the said improvement by furnishing to said Allin, at the United States armory in Springfield, Mass., the labor, material, and other requisites to that end." When the Government had done that, as he himself asserted twenty years ago over his hand and seal, and he desired to develop it and sell it to all the nations of the earth and to all the private individuals who might see fit to use that patent, if after the Government had furnished him with the labor, material, and other requisites for the purpose of making it, he could get the Government of the United States to use it, to give it a start and the name of its authority to indicate that this was a valuable invention, it doubled, it quadrupled perhaps, his power to sell to everybody else this invention as he had the right to do and retain for his own use the proceeds.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to put a question to the Senator from Connecticut in regard to that particular point as to the fact?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if this man has ever received anything from any source?

Mr. PLATT. He has not. That does not appear in the report, but it appeared on the trial before the committee.

Mr. BECK. The fact remains—I know nothing of what he did—that he had the right to sell, and that that right was certainly rendered very much more valuable by the adoption of a portion of his patent by the United States.

Mr. DAWES. I would suggest to the Senator that he is laboring under a mistake as to the nature of this patent. It was not one that could be availed of by foreign Governments or by anybody else than our Government. It was a patent method of transferring our Springfield muzzle-loading guns into what is known as the Springfield breech-loading rifle; therefore, nobody could use it but those who had the Springfield muskets. It was a patent applicable to that one purpose, and all that has been done under it is to transform Springfield muskets, which we had on hand useless because of the improvements in fire-arms, into this breech-loading rifle, and all the use that could be made of it, as I understand, was the application of this patent to those muskets. Five thousand nearly of our muskets have been transformed into breech-loading rifles, to the saving of a great amount of money to the Government, and also enabling our Government to sell those otherwise useless muskets to foreign nations, and make for ourselves quite a large profit in that transaction.

As I understand, this patent is of a kind that would be of no value to anybody who did not have these Springfield muskets.

Mr. BECK. Of course I do not know wherein the Springfield muzzle-loading musket differs from any other musket upon the face of the earth in the hands of any people, so that this invention transforming it from a muzzle-loading to a breech-loading instrument could not be applied to any other gun of the same general quality, whether called a Springfield or not. I can hardly imagine the possibility of there being such a difference between that and other muskets as to make this invention useless for any other purpose.

Mr. DAWES. It is proper that I should state that I can not make the distinction; I only know in point of fact that that is the length and breadth of the use of this patent, and half-a-dozen others built on it which the Government has been obliged in suits to pay a royalty on. They would not be of a particle of value to anybody if this patent had been held by the original inventor. I do not mean to say that I can tell why. I only state that such is the fact.

Mr. BECK. This condition of things is plainly apparent, there is no question about it. The man himself sets forth in his agreement with the United States that in his own opinion he had obtained from the United States in the form of labor, materials, and other requisites to that end a sufficient consideration for him to bargain and sell, as he does by these presents, to the United States the right to manufacture and use that portion of his patent which they saw fit to use for that purpose. There is no doubt about that. That therefore destroys all legal claim.

Other persons, it seems, have sued for the use of some other inventions which they had made and which the Government had used; but those other people were not our master armorers, they had not used the materials, the labor, or other requisites to perfect their patents which Mr. Allin says he did and which belonged to the Government. We invaded their rights and we were responsible as it seems from the statement in regard to the judgments of the courts. Here perhaps but for this conveyance, as the Senator from Missouri very well said, no use could have been made of the patent at all. The fact also remains that our use of it was an indication to all the world, to all other nations, and to individuals that in the changing of muzzle-loaders to breech-loaders this could be used for some purpose and made the invention that much more valuable, for he retained all except the rights that we were given under his patent and he obtained whatever benefit his patent would receive from the advertisement we gave it by adopting it to that extent.

I can not see myself any merit in the claim.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is reminded that in one minute the time will come for the unfinished business.

Mr. PLATT. Let me inquire of the Senator from Illinois whether he thinks the Senate is prepared to go on to-day with the discussion of the interstate-commerce bill?

Mr. CULLOM. So far as I am concerned I am anxious that the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of that bill. If there is any gentleman who desires to talk upon it I should like to know it. If not I should like to have a vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of two o'clock having arrived the unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I hope the Senator will allow that bill to be laid aside informally. I suppose the Senators who oppose as well as those who favor the passage of the Allin bill would be willing that it should be determined by the Senate at once rather than be called up another day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. HOAR. I understand the Chair has performed that duty.

The Secretary read the title of the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. HOAR. Now I ask unanimous consent, with the leave of the Senator from Illinois, that that may lie aside informally for the time being until the Senate disposes of the bill (S. 1359).

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts to lay aside informally the unfinished business and continue the consideration of the bill (S. 1359). The Chair hears no objection.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. BECK. Before the debate goes further I should like consent to make a motion now. To-morrow is Saturday, and to-morrow is the 8th of January as well, and I was about to ask leave to move now that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The Senator from Kentucky moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. COLQUITT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEWELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Military Academy appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ERSKINE S. ALLIN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1359) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, this inventor spent fifty years of his life in the armory at Springfield, which is near my own residence, and yet I never saw him nor any member of his family, nor have I ever had any communications with them on the subject of this claim. But the relation of this man to the armory and to its success as a Government armory is notorious to every one who has any knowledge of the War Department of this Government. He was an enthusiast in his devotion to the interests of that armory. He devoted his whole life to making the productions of that armory superior, if possible, to those of any other armory in the United States or abroad. He did not seek employment there to get compensation for his labor, for he was a man of such skill that he could have commanded much greater compensation elsewhere.

But in the armory he made this invention to carry out the plans of the Government, and being devoted to the interests of the Government, when he had done it he told the Government they might have the use of it. It turned out to be the basis of other patents which would be of no avail without his, which were of immense value to the Government, and which in suits by the patentees against the Government demonstrated that through his patent as the basis the Government had made immense sums of which they had to pay a royalty to other patentees. He continued his services until the end of his life, and died a poor man, having contributed greatly to the wealth and strength of the Government by this invention. When he made this invention, without knowing its real advantages to the Government, and out of his desire to show the Government that he did not wish to make money out of his position for himself, he told the Government they might have the use of it, and out of this use they have made all this money. Now, his family, left poor by him because, instead of going out into the private armories of the country and making what he could, he preferred to stay there and serve his Government, are cut off in the courts (as the Senator from Kentucky says every one knows) from a legal claim, not because he was an employé of the Government, but simply because he told the Government they might have the use of his invention.

He made this invention while in the armory. He was not employed to make it, and he made it in his own hours that belonged to him. Out of all that the Government has made from his invention is it an unreasonable thing that this bill should pass allowing $30,000 to his widow and his daughter to relieve them in the straits to which they have been put because he devoted himself so exclusively to the interests of the Government? That is the amount of it. They do not come here saying that they have a claim which they could assert in the courts, because they would not be here if they had. The reason they can not assert a claim in the courts is because of that instrument he gave to the Government to show the Government his devotion to their interests, for which the Government did not pay him a penny. And now is it quite fair for the Government to try to shield itself from such an equitable claim as this behind that paper for which it did not give him a penny?

I do not think it is exactly large business. I will not say it is small business; I will simply say it is not very large business for the Government of the United States to meet an honest, fair, equitable claim of this character with such a defense as that. That is not a proper ground, as it presents itself to my mind, but that is the attitude of the opposition to this bill. I do not mean to reflect on Senators making opposition, but that is the real force of the opposition. The Government, on the other hand, knowing just how they obtained the paper that prevents the assertion of a legal claim in the courts, say that something ought to be paid. The Government say they ought to pay $43,000. And yet of course in the line of their duty, and not to be criticised for their motive, Senators urge here in opposition to the bill that because this man was in the employ of the Government at the same time, though he did not make the invention in their time, his heirs shall have nothing for this valuable invention. He thought so much of the service he was rendering to the Government that he was willing to let the Government have the use of his invention, and the Government took it without paying a dollar; and now at the end, knowing how much value it is to them, they say he ought to have compensation for it; but there is opposition here on the ground I have stated. I do think Senators should not make such an opposition.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to add merely a sentence or two. It seems to me that this is not simply a question of the amount of a private claim, but it is a question which involves a very important public policy.

No speculator, no claimant, who is trying to make up a case against the Government presents himself here. This is the case of a widow and an orphaned daughter of a public servant who gave, as my colleague said, fifty years of his life to the public service and died a poor man.

Is it or not sound policy for this Government to avail itself of the resources which the inventive genius of the country can put at its command in time of war in naval and military operations? We do not keep a trained standing army; we do not have a powerful navy. We differ from every other nation on earth in that particular, because every other nation on earth is of the opinion that it is for its interest to have an army and a navy to the extent of its pecuniary resources and capacity, so that, as has been well said, every laborer in Europe carries a soldier on his back.

We trust to a different means for our defense and for our power. In the first place, we have a country that everybody is willing to fight for when it is in danger. Next, we have a wealthy and strong people whose wealth is fostered without the burden of a great military preparation in time of peace. And thirdly, and perhaps more than anything else, we rely on the inventive genius of our people. God has given inventive skill to the brain of man in this country which He has given to no other country and no other people on the face of the earth, and to this age which has been given to no other since the beginning of time. Warfare is to be, both by land and sea, hereafter very largely a conflict of mechanical forces, mechanical resources, and mechanical ingenuity. The machinery of warfare is constantly improving, constantly changing.

Now, it seems to me that it is for the interest of this Government to let the mechanical genius of this country understand that whenever a great military or naval invention is made the inventor will be regarded as a public benefactor with whom we shall not deal in the spirit of pleas in abatement or a captious looking after our mere legal rights or our mere legal defenses, but that everybody who has inventive power and turns it in the direction of military or naval mechanism shall know when he does it that, if he accomplishes a result by which the military or naval strength of this county is increased, he is to be regarded as a public benefactor whom the law-making power of this country will be inclined to deal with liberally and to reward.

Here is a man who enabled the Government of the United States to take an old stock of disused and outgrown and antiquated arms and transform them into the best modern arms known to civilized man; and the officers of the Government, not apt to encourage such claims, come in and say that man deserves a recompense very much larger than that which has been reported by our committee; and a unanimous committee, with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] at its head, who is always cautious, takes the careful side in favor of the Government in all such cases, comes in here and recommends the allowance of this sum. It seems to me that those authorities will warrant the Senate and House of Representatives in passing the bill for this small sum.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I voted to take the bill up for consideration as a matter of courtesy to the Senator from Connecticut, as he desired its consideration. That vote might be construed as committing me in favor of this bill, but I am not. I can see nothing in the claim set up either of a legal or an equitable character that entitles it to the favorable consideration of this body. I believe the friends of this measure do not claim that there is any legal claim binding on this Government to make any allowances whatever to these ladies as representatives of the deceased inventor; but they rest upon equitable considerations. For my life I can not see upon what ground even an equitable claim can be based for this allowance. If it were pressed as a mere gratuity, an appeal to the liberality of Congress, it would be another thing; but it is now pressed by its friends on the ground that it is an equitable claim against the Government. If I have understood aright the exhibits which have been read, every claim of a legal or equitable character has been cut off by the assignment made by the patentee. Now after he is dead, departing from the assignment of the invention to the Government, the heirs come here and claim that in equity the Government of the United States is under obligation to indemnify them for the invention of the father and the husband. I can not see that there is the slightest equity whatever involved in the case.

If it were an appeal to the generosity, to the liberality, to the bounty of Congress to aid people in indigent circumstances, that might be a consideration on which we might act, but I can not recognize that there is any claim on the Government. If I could believe there was a claim, legal or equitable, I would not be averse to making some proper allowance; but as a mere matter of generosity, there are so many objects which desire the liberality and generosity of the Government that I could not vote in favor of this measure in preference to others. There are hundreds of thousands of widows and daughters in the country as meritorious as these ladies, I have no doubt, are. I do not question that they are meritorious and worthy people; but there are hundreds and thousands in even more indigent circumstances in the country to-day than they are; and why can not they come as a mere matter of bounty and appeal to the Senate in favor of some allowance?

I am not disposed to doubt that Mr. Allin made a very useful invention. I have no doubt that he was enthusiastic in his profession, as was said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], but I apprehend that being in the service of the Government, a master of ordnance, pleased with this position he held under the Government, he went to work to perfect the ordnance over which he had some control, and he called in the aid of the Government of the United States; he used the material of the Government of the United States, and the labor furnished by the Government of the United States, in the shops of the Government of the United States, and did succeed in making a very useful invention to the Government, I have no doubt.

Recognizing his obligation to the Government for the assistance rendered him in the invention, he voluntarily made a transfer of it. He never made a claim himself so far as I am aware, but he voluntarily made a transfer of any claim which he might have to the Government of the United States. The equitable claim that is now set up is an after-consideration on the part of those who succeeded the man who voluntarily transferred to the Government any interest or right which he had in the invention, which was perfected by the assistance he received from the Government, as he recognized in the very instrument making the transfer.

That the Government has the right to grant an allowance, I have no question; but that does not entitle the parties to any equitable claim, because all their claim of any character, legal or equitable, was cut off by the assignment of the patentee himself. It is a mere appeal, then, to the generosity of the Government.

But it is said that the officers of the Government recognized the right of these parties to some indemnity because of the transfer by the originator of his claim. That may be the view of the officers connected with that Department. They are entitled to their view, but their views are not to control our judgment absolutely. We ought to give them proper consideration, but we are not to determine our votes simply by the recommendation either of the Secretary of War or of any subordinate of the War Department. We are here to act upon our own judgment.

For my part, while I have no doubt that these are worthy people, while they may be in indigent circumstances, there are so many other people in the country who are fully as indigent and as worthy as these ladies that I can not select them out as the objects of the bounty of the Government.

Now in reference to patents generally, I concur with the view of the Senator from Massachusetts last on the floor [Mr. HOAR] that the inventive genius of America is very great, that it has contributed very much to the advancement of the interests of the country; but I want to say here and now that while the inventive genius of our people is a matter of which we ought to be proud, it has been a very considerable tax upon many of the industries of this country. If you go through the agricultural section of the country to-day, there is scarcely a plow in use in tilling the soil but has the stamp of a patent upon it. The very implements by which we raise the bread we eat and the bread that feeds the country is taxed by patents. The wire fencing around the farms is taxed because some man made a hook and hitched it to a wire.

While there have been great advantages there have been many disadvantages arising out of the patents which have been granted by this Government. In the whole account between the advantages and disadvantages which have resulted to the people of this country from the operations of the Patent Office, I am not certain that the country is much the gainer by such an institution.

Mr. President, I shall not vote for this bill. I think I have as generous a heart as most people, and if as a mere matter of gratuity I were willing to give away with liberality the means of the Government to needy people I should no doubt be as willing to contribute from the public fund as anybody; but I do not regard the Senate as an almoner of bounty, especially from the Treasury of the United States. Individually in the exercise of our own rights, out of our own pockets, we might be disposed to deal generously, but there ought to be a limitation upon our action in reference to the pocket-books of the tax-payers of this country. For one I shall not vote to give away the money which is paid into the Treasury by the tax-payers of the country, merely on appeals to generosity of feeling of the Senate in reference to widows or orphans.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, this is not a question whether the patent laws are desirable or valuable. We have the patent laws upon the statute-book. I do not believe any intelligent person will ever question the propriety of the enactment of those laws. The great benefit that has been derived from inciting the inventive genius of this country is too apparent. It is too late in the day now to discuss that question, even if it was pertinent and proper in the consideration of the pending measure, as it is not.

This is not a new question. There are a great many precedents of this character which have passed the Senate and passed the House and been enacted into law. The Government of the United States has not any right to use the patent of a person employed in its service, unless it employs that person for the purpose of inventing improvements of the kind patented, because the inventor was in the service of the Government at the time of the invention. That has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States on more than one occasion. The rule is laid down as it was stated by the board of inquiry presided over by Thomas, Hancock, and Terry in this very case, that unless the party inventing the device was in the employ of the Government for the purpose of doing that particular kind of work, that is to invent, he can recover. A great number of cases can be cited where Congress has voted compensation.

In this case Mr. Allin made an assignment, not as the Senator who last spoke said, because the Government had developed this patent, not because the Government had assisted him in devising this invention, but because the United States aided in developing, perfecting, and applying it to practical use. Therefore he made the assignment. The Government had all the benefit of it. In some cases where, as stated by the chairman, a minor patent had been used, the Government was compelled by the courts to pay in one instance 10 cents a gun, and in another 25, and in one case the aggregate was more than $75,000. None of these patents would have been available but for the fact that they were based upon this patent. This is the ground-patent of the whole, as I understand, and all the other inventions subsequent thereto are minor in character.

I have here a list of precedents of this very kind of case. I recollect one case in particular that I think the Senator from Missouri, if I am not mistaken, favored.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to this particular case? I ask if there is on record in the Senate of the United States one solitary case where Congress has made compensation when the patentee had made an absolute grant of the patent to the Government before it was used.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, Mr. President, if the Senator puts it upon that ground, that this man generously donated to the Government the use of his patent (and not only the Government but the world got the benefit of it to a very great extent), and when his heirs come here and ask for a small sum, if the Senator proposes to rely upon the fact that there was an assignment, of course I doubt whether another case of the kind can be found. But we can find a great number of cases where compensation was paid to persons in the employ of the United States who made inventions where the Government used them, as the Government did use this for many years under a claim of right.

For many years it was asserted by all departments of the Government that a man in the employ of the Government making an invention of this character had not any title to it against the Government. That was the theory of the Government until the Supreme Court of the United States decided otherwise. I say that the people who made these inventions in the employ of the United States have subsequently come to Congress or gone to the courts and found redress and compensation for the use of their patents.

This assignment was made years before the decision of the Supreme Court, when the Government of the United States was declaring that it had the right, when the officers were saying to the inventor, "you are in the employ of the Government and you can not have any property in a patent." Nobody knows what influence was brought to bear upon him to compel him to make the assignment, whether it was voluntary or involuntary.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have the Senator adduce proof of that statement.

Mr. TELLER. It does not make any difference when the case is presented here as an equitable claim against the Government, and that is what it is. If it was a legal claim, the heirs could do as other people who have inventions of this kind; they could go into the courts and compel a recognition of this claim. Now if the Senator wishes, I will hear him.

I was about to say that I have here a list of precedents which can be cited:

C. P. Hartt, widow of the late naval constructor, S. T. Hartt, for the use of a gun-elevating screw used on iron gun-carriages of the United States Navy, the sum of $3,000. (See Statutes, volume 15, page 461.)

Authorizing the Postmaster-General to pay for patented instruments for post-marking mail packages, and cancellation of postage stamps, the sum of ——. (See Statutes, volume 16, page 670.)

A. G. Snyder, of the Watervliet Arsenal, Troy, N. Y., for the use of his patented bullet machine in the United States arsenals, the sum of $5,000. (See Statutes, volume 16, page 700.)

R. M. Green, for his patent for a machine for bending chain cable-links, connecting shackles and tackle hooks, the sum of $10,000. (See Statutes, volume 17, page 711.)

J. B. Emerson, for an infringement by the Government of the United States of his letters patent, dated March, 1834, the sum of $25,610. (See Statutes, volume 17, page 737.)

T. J. Rodman, for improvements by him in cannon while an officer in the Army of the United States, a sum amounting to over $300,000.

William H. Bell, for an elevating screw for a cannon, $20,000.

The legal representatives of Henry M. Shreve, deceased, for the patented snag-boat invented by said Henry M. Shreve while in the employ of the United States Government, the sum of $50,000.

If I am not very much mistaken the last case came from the Committee on Claims, of which at that time the Senator from Missouri who has addressed the Senate on this subject was the chairman. I believe it had his approval both in the committee and on this floor.

Mr. COCKRELL. What case is that?

Mr. TELLER. That is the snag-boat case, the Senator will remember. I believe Mr. Shreve was a citizen of Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, he was not a citizen of Missouri.

Mr. TELLER. At all events the snag-boat was largely used in the waters of Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. He has been dead ten or fifteen years.

Mr. TELLER. I recollect that he received at the hands of Congress $50,000. At the time when that invention was made he was an employé of the United States, and asserted his right to a patent. He was denied his right; but after the decision of the Supreme Court his heirs came here and obtained an appropriation of $50,000.

There is a great number of these cases cited in the document before me, some of them being exactly in point and others not. In some of them the parties were in the employ of the Government, and in other cases they were not. We have paid as high as a dollar a gun royalty for some of the inventions which have been used in the manufacture of arms. In this case the representatives of Mr. Allin claimed $100,000. The War Department reported that they were entitled to 10 cents a gun, or about forty-three thousand and some odd dollars. The committee, believing it was a case where the Government of the United States has had the benefit of the inventive genius of one of its citizens without compensation, determined that a fair compensation would be $30,000. In that the committee are supported by a long line of precedents, some of which I have mentioned; and there are very many more, running back many years before.

I submit that the tax-payers of the United States are not specially disturbed when the Government of the United States pays its honest debts, nor when the Government of the United States pays an equitable claim that is held against it by any citizen of this Republic. There might have been a time in the early history of this country when we were poor and distressed and largely in debt, when the people were complaining of being taxed to an extent that they are not now complaining, when it might have been said that $30,000 was a pretty large sum to pay where there was no legal obligation; but in these days of an overflowing Treasury, with a surplus in the Treasury accumulating at the rate of a hundred millions a year beyond the possibility of its expenditure, I do not believe the people want the Government of the United States to adopt any picayunish policy with reference to claims of this character.

It has become a settled idea among the people of the United States that a claim against the Government of the United States, no matter how legal it may be, is of but little value to a claimant; that it is all eaten up and wasted in the expenses attendant upon securing its passage through this body and the other, or through the courts, if it is a case proper to go to the courts of law. We are able to pay our debts. We ought to be willing to pay our debts. We ought not to stand upon any technicality. Because the party in ignorance of his right, under duress, as it were, by his employers, may have assigned his invention, or because he was generous enough to say, "I will turn over and give to this great Government the benefit of my invention," we ought not to avail ourselves of a technicality of that kind to deny to his destitute wife and destitute child a fair compensation such as we would have been compelled by law to have given to them if the ancestor, the father and the husband, had not been so generous in his treatment of the Government.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I think it must be very difficult to find any reasonable ground upon which there can be any opposition to this bill. I apprehend that the question of an assignment will not properly have any part in its proper consideration. I have no doubt that if the Senator from Missouri had received a gift of a valuable property from any person and that person's children should come to him in distress afterward and say to him, "My father gave to you a valuable property from which you have derived great benefit; I am now in destitution, and I ask of you out of your abundance to relieve me," he would scarcely say, "You have not any legal claim upon me; your father gave to me that valuable property."

But, Mr. President, the Congress of the United States never acts from legal obligations. It is above the law. It makes the law. It acts from principles of equity and honesty and fair-dealing with the citizens of this country.

Who shall say that this patent, being the property of this citizen, he having generously allowed the Government to use it, the people of the United States deriving every benefit from the use of his private property, he being uncompensated and his children being now in want and necessity, that this great people from their abundant means shall not recognize the patriotism, the liberality of this citizen in his donation, and make some compensation to his heirs?

There can be but one side to this question. It is not a matter of legal obligation, but it rests upon the same foundation that all legal obligation rests upon—services have been given, a valuable consideration bestowed, and no compensation made.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I am always moved when I hear the "overflowing Treasury" referred to as an excuse why we should make an appropriation; it is such a conclusive constitutional argument of the right, power, and duty of this body to put its hands into the pockets of the tax-payers and make gratuities to objects worthy or unworthy! And I am always moved when the widow's plea is brought in; the poor widow and the orphan.

That reminds me of a most effective appeal of a poor widow some few years ago which was brought before the Senate and the Committee on Patents. The poor widow came down here to Washington to get an extension of a patent-right, and Senators were appealed to to aid the poor widow. The question was raised as to whether she had not assigned her right, and Senators were assured by her paid attorneys that the benefit would go to her. But still some doubted, and she was taken before the Committee on Patents, and there, under oath, disclosed that all her sympathy, her widowhood and all, was wrapped up in $20,000, which were to be paid to her in the event that the patent-right was extended. This is the kind of appeals which are made to Senators and to Congress to get money out of the Treasury. Some shrewd claim agent or attorney gets a widow and orphan and brings them before Congress and hides behind them, and Senators' sympathies are appealed to, and they are pointed to the "overflowing Treasury" as a reason why their sympathies should yield to unjust demands.

Mr. President, I say this case is absolutely without one particle of equity upon the report made by the committee. Let us analyze it just one moment. I doubt seriously, and the committee doubts, whether this is any patent-right at all that is valid. I do not believe that this patent-right could be established in a court of justice, Let us see. The committee say:

He—

Referring to Allin—

He was not the first inventor of that feature of the alteration of the Springfield musket to the Springfield rifle which is known as the swinging breech-block pivoted to the barrel, swinging upwards and forwards, so that a fixed cartridge could be inserted in the barrel, and then closing so that a solid resistance was furnished to the recoil of the cartridge, but seems—

"But seems," mysteriously "seems"— to have been the first inventor who made such feature a practical operative improvement in the alteration of muzzle-loading fire-arms to breech-loaders.

There is a confession of the committee that this invention was used before this man asserted his patent to it, and that it could not be established in a court of justice as a patent-right. There is the deliberate language of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], and he can not go back on it.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. COCKRELL. With infinite pleasure.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator's knowledge of patents and mechanical inventions was as great as his hostility to them seems to be, he would not see any such confession in the language as he thinks now he has discovered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I read it. People generally understood the English language. The distinguished Senator's love for patentees and their rights as against the tax-payers of the country may blind him to his own language. He says that Mr. Allin was not the first inventor of that feature. Does that mean that he was? Is that the meaning of the Senator's language?

Mr. PLATT. No claim has been made, either in the report or elsewhere, that he invented the swinging over of the breech-block, but the claim is that he did make an invention which made that a practical, operative matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then that has never been tested. I will read from the Chief of Ordnance to show that he doubted whether there was any valid patent or not.

He was not the first inventor of that feature, * * * but seems to have been the first inventor who made such feature a practical, operative improvement in the alteration of muzzle-loading fire-arms to breech-loaders. A great many improvements have since been made to his proposed method of alteration, both at the armory and by the adoption of outside inventions which are now in use, making a perfect method of alteration. The gun known as the model of 1865 included all the devices of Allin set forth in his patent, and 5,020 Springfield muzzle-loading rifles were changed to breech-loaders by use of the devices shown in the Allin patent. Subsequent improvements, as has been intimated, were made, and the improved guns were known at the armory as the models of 1866, 1868, 1870, 1873, 1879, and 1884.

General Benét, in referring to this matter in his report, says:

Of course this office does not pretend to decide on the validity of the patent, although the validity of the "locking device" used by the United States invented by Mr. Allin has never been questioned, as far as this office is aware.

Why did he put that in if there had not been some question about the validity of the patent? That question was raised by the committee itself. It is extremely doubtful whether this man had any patent at all that he could assert in a court of justice or before any proper tribunal.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts nearest me [Mr. DAWES] says that this patent was used only in the alteration of muskets. I do not so understand the committee; I do not so understand the record. The committee say:

The history of such improvements shows the gradual and successive approach toward the perfection of the arm as now manufactured. Of the models of 1866, 1868, 1870, 1873, 1879, and 1884, 432,873 Springfield rifles have been manufactured.

Not altered. Five thousand muskets were altered, but 432,000 have been manufactured according to the report, and so the same language is used. There was but one single device of this alleged or claimed patent that was used.

Mr. President, I say that this is an anomalous case. It is a case where a man for a full equivalent has made an absolute conveyance and assignment.

Mr. DAWES. Why do you say "full?"

Mr. COCKRELL. I say "full equivalent," because it is a grant. It is not a gift. There is no gift about it. The word "gift" is not used. It is a grant, bargain, and sale. For what? For the sum of $1, and from the fact that the United States had—aided in developing, perfecting, and applying to practical use the said improvement by furnishing to said Allin * * * the labor—

Not his own labor, but the labor of others—

material—

Not his own material, but bought material—and other requisites to that end.

In other words, they furnished him labor, material, machinery, and everything that he might go on, and they paid him for his labor besides. That is certainly an equivalent.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator did not quite understand my question. I asked him what made him say it was a full equivalent. While he is on his feet I should like to ask him on what ground he says it is extremely doubtful whether Mr. Allin had any patent. I ask on those two points.

Mr. COCKRELL. I said the first because the committee say so.

Mr. DAWES. Do they say that it is doubtful?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, they do not say that, but I say it from their language. He was not the first inventor, they say.

Mr. DAWES. But there can be two inventors and both inventions be valid, one upon another, can there not?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, sir; there can not be two inventors of the same identical thing, as a matter of course not.

Mr. DAWES. I always supposed there could be, but I may be mistaken.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think the Senator would do himself the injustice to say that there can be two inventors of the same thing under the patent laws of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senator will wait until I have said it before he makes that remark. I asked him if there could not be two inventors, one after another, upon the same thing—one invention built upon another, an improvement upon one thing. That is what I asked him.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; he can be the inventor of the improvement, but he can not claim anything for the original.

Mr. DAWES. Nobody has done so.

Mr. COCKRELL. But he must claim for the improvement.

Mr. DAWES. The trouble with the Senator is that nobody has made any claim on any ground that the Senator has been controverting. Nobody has claimed that in an action at law such a form of assignment would not be a bar; nobody has asserted otherwise. The Senator has argued that at great length against nobody; nobody has claimed that; and when those who took the invention say that they took it without consideration and ought to pay notwithstanding the assignment, the Senator says that the inventor received full satisfaction!

Mr. COCKRELL. I say that there is not one particle of evidence in the report to sustain the statement of the Senator. There have been a great many gratuitous statements made here about this matter. I say there is not a word to show that the men who accepted this conveyance ever made any pledges or any statement of the kind referred to by the Senator; not a word of it.

Mr. DAWES. Nobody said they had made any pledges. The Government took this paper, and it is the Government whose documents are before the Senator saying that the heirs of the inventor ought to have $43,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg pardon, it is not the Government. The Chief of Ordnance is not the Government of the United States, and he is the only man who pretends to say anything about the value of it.

Mr. DAWES. Is he not the man who knows most about it?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Chief of Ordnance says:

> In my opinion 10 cents per gun containing his improvement would be a fair and reasonable compensation for the invention.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. COCKRELL. As a matter of course, with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. DAWES. I only want to inquire if the Chief of Ordnance, who transacted all this business, does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. COCKRELL. He is not the United States by any means, and his gratuitous statement, made twenty years after the transaction, can not bind the United States. This letter was written March 10, 1886. He was no party to this transaction.

Why did Mr. Allin make this conveyance? Here is the truth of it now; there is no use in disguising the fact: He held an important position. He was only too glad to hold it. He was getting the pay of a skilled mechanic in that position. He wanted to retain it. He had been devoting his own labor to these inventions. He had used the Government material; he had used the employés in the Government armory there to aid him; he had used the machinery of the Government to perfect this invention; he was paid his own salary all the time, and he was retained there fifty years. He feels, like an honest employé of the Government, that he has no right to leave any claim in his own hands or the hands of his heirs to be pressed by claim agents that compensation should be made for that kind of an invention, and therefore as an honest man, and doubtless with some understanding with the officers who were then, in 1867, in the armory, he made the assignment. Those officers are not there now. They are not the officers who made this report. Here is the record of this transfer found. The parties who made it are not permitted to come in and make any explanation. He doubtless told them, "Here; I will make a conveyance, a grant, an assignment of this patent right to the Government. You have permitted me to do this, and you retain me in the service;" and he was retained there until his death, was he not?

Mr. DAWES. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. Was he not retained until his death?

Mr. DAWES. Now, let me ask——

Mr. COCKRELL. Not just now; I want to know if he was not retained until his death?

Mr. PLATT. The report says so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will yield to a question but not to a speech, for I want the Senator to have his own chance when I get through.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to ask a question. Suppose the statement is true that the Government of the United States got the assignment out of him under threat that he would lose his place?

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not saying that. That is your supposition.

Mr. DAWES. I understood——

Mr. COCKRELL. That is your supposition. All kinds of suppositions are made against the Government of the United States and none in its favor.

Now, there was the consideration. It was a fair one; it was a just one. It was a full equivalent; and doubtless this gentleman expected that by giving the right to the United States to introduce this patent, as he had to develop it and make it perfect, it would become immensely valuable elsewhere. He may have been unfortunate. He may have made millions of dollars and spent them and his wife and children be in poverty to-day for aught I know. That is all speculation. There is no evidence about it except that they are poor; and now, after he is dead, twenty years nearly since the conveyance was made, his widow and heirs, it is said, come in and make this claim.

Now, suppose the Senator from Massachusetts was the president of a corporation the money of whose stockholders had been invested in machinery and materials and they had employed a master workman or a superintendent and were paying him wages out of their means, and they imagined that he could make some useful invention which would enable them to increase their manufactured product and realize handsomely from it, and would give him their other laborers, other employés, furnish him material, furnish him the machinery, the man receiving full wages all the time, and he went on using this labor of others, this material, and this machinery, and made some invention which was useful to the firm in whose employ he was engaged, and after it was done, not immediately but two years afterwards, and after his corporation had developed and perfected it, then if that employé should make to the corporation a grant, an absolute, unconditional grant, bargain, sale, and assignment, and should deliver it to the company, and twenty years after that time, after the company had retained that master workman in their employ until his death, if his widow and children were to come in and ask the Senator from Massachusetts to put his hand into his own pocket and take his money out and give a gratuity to them, would he do it? No, sir; there is not a Senator on this floor who would; and yet that is precisely the case here, nothing more and nothing less.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment reported by the Committee on Patents reducing the amount from $100,000 to $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Patents was, in line 9, after the words "inventor of," to insert "improvements used in the manufacture of;" so as to read:

> The said Allin being the inventor of improvements used in the manufacture of the Springfield breech-loading rifle-musket, for which neither he nor his heirs have received any compensation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. PLATT and Mr. TELLER. Take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. We may just as well take them on the pending question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question the Senator from Missouri demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. I do not know how he would vote on this question, and therefore I refrain from voting.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 26, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Aldrich,	Cullom,	McPherson,	Spooner,
Allison,	Dawes,	Mahone,	Stanford,
Blair,	Dolph,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Teller,
Bowen,	Evarts,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Williams,
Call,	Frye,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.
Cameron,	Hawley,	Sawyer,
Cheney,	Hoar,	Sewell,

NAYS—21.

Beck,	Eustis,	Morgan,	Walthall,
Berry,	George,	Plumb,	Whitthorne,
Camden,	Gibson,	Pugh,	Wilson of Md.
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Saulsbury,

Chace,	Harrison,	Manderson,	Sabin,
Conger,	Ingalls,	Miller,	Sherman,
Edmunds,	Jones of Arkansas,	Morrill,	Van Wyck,
Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Palmer,	Voorhees.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should like to make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs, and ask for the consideration of a bill.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Nebraska will allow me to say that the report of the committee of conference on the bill in relation to interstate commerce is entitled to be taken up and considered on motion.

Mr. PLATT. It was only laid aside informally.

Mr. CULLOM. It was laid aside informally and is entitled to the right of way. I should like to have the consideration of that bill continued to-day. I am informed, however, by four Senators who are anxious to address the Senate upon the bill that they are not prepared to go on to-day. I therefore have been disposed to give way to other business, and I will say now that I shall not call up the report to-day with the understanding that immediately after the morning business on Monday next I shall ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration; and I shall ask the Senate on Wednesday next to remain in session until it is disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator that he also ask that it be informally laid aside now with the distinct understanding that it shall be the unfinished business on Monday. That is its position now, and I would not prejudice it by letting it go over without such an understanding.

Mr. CULLOM. I will ask that if it is necessary to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks that the report of the committee of conference on the bill known as the interstate-commerce bill be laid aside informally and that it be considered the unfinished business for Monday next. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

MILITARY INSTRUCTION.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask leave to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a House bill, and I would request the present consideration of the bill. It will take but a moment to dispose of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs at this time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANDERSON. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. 7192) to provide a school of instruction for cavalry and light artillery, and for the construction and completion of quarters, barracks, and stables at certain posts for the use of the Army of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska further asks for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. There is an amendment to the bill reducing the appropriation from $175,000 to $85,000. I ask that it be acted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 2 of the bill, and insert:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to complete the quarters and barracks at Fort D. A. Russell, in the Territory of Wyoming, at an expense not exceeding $30,000, and to complete the quarters and barracks at Fort Robinson, in the State of Nebraska, for a garrison of ten companies, at a cost not to exceed $55,000; and there is hereby appropriated for the purposes mentioned in this section, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $85,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment to the bill, and ask for a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska further moves that the Senate insist on its amendment and ask for a conference thereon. Is that the pleasure of the Senate? It is agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. MANDERSON, Mr. HAWLEY, and Mr. HAMPTON were appointed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3089) granting permission to Lewis M. Haupt to test a system of current deflectors; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3090) granting an increase of pension to Andrew Franklin, alias McKee; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BANGS, BROWNELL & CO.

Mr. SPOONER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1034) for the relief of Bangs, Brownell & Co.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Bangs, Brownell & Co. $5,000 for tar and wood seized by the United States and sold and for use of vessel and loss of tools and materials.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. SPOONER July 14, 1886:

That the bill passed the House of Representatives on the 16th of June, 1886, upon the recommendation of the Committee on War Claims, which committee made the following report:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Bangs, Brownell & Co., report as follows:

That the claimants being engaged, under military permit and regulation, in the manufacture of tar on the coast of Florida, on the 18th of April, 1865, a vessel, the schooner Martha M., under charter to them and laden with tar and wood, was seized by the military authorities of the United States at Barrancas, Fla., while making the voyage from Florida to New Orleans. The cargo was removed from the vessel and subsequently turned over to the agent of the Treasury, and, finally, on the 16th of June, 1865, the vessel was returned to the claimants. The claim is as follows:

For 246 barrels of tar, at $10	$2,460 00
For 15 cords of wood, at $10	150 00
For loss of tools and materials	1,000 00
For use of vessel from April 18 to June 16, 1865	1,800 00
Total	5,410 00

The petitioners filed their claim with Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War, early in 1866, by whom the same was referred to the Quartermaster-General for examination, who turned over the papers to the chief quartermaster of the Military Division of the Gulf for examination. After investigation by this official the claim was passed on and disallowed for want of jurisdiction, though the entire justice of the claim was admitted, as the Comptroller of the Treasury, in his letter of April 12, 1867, says:

"This claim is just, but not being founded on contract, express or implied, and there being no law of Congress authorizing its settlement and payment, and being for property appropriated by the military authorities in one of the rebel States, the accounting officers have no power to act in the premises. Congress alone has jurisdiction, and on a proper showing I have do doubt will grant adequate relief."

On May 6, 1872, this claim was filed with the commissioners of claims, who also disallowed it for want of jurisdiction. In their report they say:

"The vessel and cargo were seized and Mr. Brownell arrested, imprisoned, tried before a military commission and acquitted, and after two or three months' detention Mr. Brownell was released and the vessel restored to him, but the tar had been turned over to the Treasury agent and shipped away, and the proceeds of it are probably in the public Treasury at this time. The whole proceeding against Mr. Brownell and this property was unjustifiable on the part of the local commanding officers, and was severely censured by the department commander. But as the property was not taken for the use of the Army or Navy of the United States, the claim is not within the jurisdiction of the commissioners and must be disallowed."

In view of the foregoing statement of facts your committee must regard this claim as just in its character, though too large in amount, and recommend the payment of $5,000, and report a bill appropriating the sum of $5,000, and recommend its passage.

Your committee adopt the statement of facts contained in the above report, and therefore report back the bill with the recommendation that the same do pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask my friend from Wisconsin what was the difficulty of jurisdiction with the Southern Claims Commission in respect of hearing this claim, and whether that is the commission that said they had not jurisdiction?

Mr. SPOONER. That, as I understand, is the commission referred to in the report, and they decided that they had not jurisdiction and refused to entertain the claim. I have not looked to see on what ground they based their decision.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Southern Claims Commission decided that they had not jurisdiction of this claim—which, so far as I can understand from the reading of the report, would be strange—then I have no objection to make on this report; but if the Southern Claims Commission had jurisdiction of this claim, it is extremely dangerous to have it left out of the scrutiny of that body, which had the power to summon and examine witnesses and find out the whole truth and have it come into Congress afterward. But my friend from Wisconsin says that the claims commission referred to in the report was the Commission for Southern Claims, and that they decided that they had not jurisdiction. Taking that to be so, I have nothing to say against the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SEMON, BACHE & CO.

Mr. EVARTS. I ask consent to call up the bill (S. 2871) which is No. 1792 on the Calendar. It was reported toward the close of the last session by the Claims Committee without amendment and without dissent. It is a simple transaction of paying out of the Treasury to some merchants in New York city, Semon, Bache & Co., the sum of $3,562.56 for the purpose of refunding the duties paid by the firm upon glass from imported stock furnished to the National Museum and to the New Orleans, Louisville, and Cincinnati expositions for exhibition cases. The whole matter is in a nutshell. This imported glass, if ordered for the United States, would have been paid for at what is called the short price, and no duty would have been collected; but there was an immediate demand on the part of the Government for these expositions and the use of this glass therefor. It was then in stock and the duty had been paid. The Government paid these merchants the short price, and now they only ask that the duty may be refunded to them, as the price that was paid them was based on the fact that the duty was to be refunded. It was brought to the notice of Congress by the Smithsonian management, and it speaks for itself on the face of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2871).

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2871) for the relief of Semon, Bache & Co.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD ATTORNEYS.

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. I do not want to interfere, but while the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] is here I wish to suggest that a bill that has been called up and argued a good deal, relative to members of Congress acting as railroad attorneys, has been postponed from time to time awaiting the presence of the Senator from New York. I hope he will be able to tell us about what time he desires to have the bill taken up, as I want it disposed of one way or the other.

Mr. EVARTS. I shall be very glad to have it considered next week, but it will make no difference to me whether it is taken up before the interstate-commerce bill or afterwards; but I suppose it will have to wait for that.

Mr. BECK. I was about to suggest to have it taken up immediately after the disposition of the interstate-commerce bill, that we may dispose of it one way or the other.

Mr. EVARTS. That will suit me.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 127) for the relief of H. K. Belding; and

A bill (S. 1577) to amend the third section of an act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the Sac and Fox and Iowa Indian reservations in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885.

The message also requested the Senate to send to the House of Representatives a duplicate engrossed copy of Senate bill (S. 938) for the relief of Chittenden Brothers, which passed the Senate August 4, 1886, the original engrossed copy having been lost.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 229) to provide for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C., with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5131) for the relief of A. F. and N. C. Saint John;

A bill (H. R. 5262) for the relief of Mrs. Frances Marshall;

A bill (H. R. 5775) for the relief of James M. McKamey; and

A bill (H. R. 6312) for the relief of James M. Grigsby.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 1085) for the relief of Albion S. Keith; and

A bill (H. R. 5692) for the relief of James B. Russell.

CLAIMS UNDER EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. MAHONE. I move to take up the bill (S. 1884).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves to take up the bill (S. 1884) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some explanation of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not yet in order. The bill has not been taken up.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read for information, so that we may know what we are acting on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Pending the motion to take up that bill, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator from Vermont yield to me to submit an amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to take up the bill indicated by him, pending which the Senator from Vermont moves to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I yield to my friend from New Jersey.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I desire consent to submit an amendment to a bill now before the Senate, which in its present stage is not properly amendable; but, at the same time, as the Senate may insist upon its former action touching that bill and certain facts are necessary to be before the conference, and also that that committee shall be instructed, I desire to offer this amendment simply for the information of the Senate, that it my be printed and laid before the Senate pending action on the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the proposed amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to have it read.

Mr. HARRIS. I suppose it relates to the interstate-commerce bill.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It is the interstate commerce bill to which I have alluded.

Mr. HARRIS. It is not in order to present an amendment to that bill, but I shall be glad to allow the Senator to have his proposition printed, but not in the form of an amendment offered to the bill.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I simply offer it that it may be printed, and I desire to state in this connection that it is my intention——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order. If there be no objection the order to print will be made. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I ask that my proposition be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendments proposed by Mr. MCPHERSON to the conference report are as follows:

At the end of section 5 add:

"Provided, however, That after full investigation the commission or a majority thereof are of the opinion that the interests of both shippers and carriers will be best promoted by an equitable division of the traffic, or of the proceeds thereof, between the carriers, the provisions of this section may not be enforced prior to January 1, 1888; and it shall be the duty of the commission to report their action with the reasons therefor to Congress in December next."

In line 3, section 11, strike out "five" and insert "nine."

In line 17, section 11, strike out "three" and insert "six."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CALL. I appeal to the Senator from Vermont not to press his motion. There are a number of small bills here that might be disposed of this evening.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know, but there is a large amount of executive business which it is important should be disposed of, and the matter that is about to come up, and properly, for it should be fully and fairly considered, is one of such importance that we can not attend to it at this time. I think it better, therefore, for the public interest that we should attend to some of our executive duties at this time.

Mr. CALL. I agree with the Senator in regard to that bill, and I hope the Senator from Vermont will not press his motion at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is better that we should attend to the other business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour spent in executive session, the doors were opened, and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 10, 1887, at 12 o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 7, 1887.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. HENLEY appeared and resumed his seat to-day.

UNITED STATES LEGATION, ETC., IN COREA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with inclosures, a letter from the Secretary of State in relation to the establishment of United States legation and consulates in Corea; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SALARIES, ETC., OF COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and asking an immediate additional appropriation for salaries and expenditures of collectors of internal revenue for the current fiscal year, required to execute provisions of the oleomargarine act and of the act in relation to the inspection of exported tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DAM SITE AT HERR'S ISLAND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, with inclosures, recommending legislation authorizing the purchase of land for a dam site at Herr's Island, Allegheny River; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF WISCONSIN RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, a report from the board of engineers upon the examination and surveys of Wisconsin River from Portage to its mouth; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Mississippi River Commission in reference to the works of protection to the banks of that river, also to the failure to make provision for the expenses of the commission; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

COOSA RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, a letter from Captain Hoxie, Corps of Engineers, referring to purchase of site for lock No. 4 and dam on the Coosa River; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

AMITE RIVER, LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from Maj. W. H. Heuer, Corps of Engineers, recommending that appropriations for Amite River, Louisiana, be applied also to the improvement of its tributary, Bayou Manchac; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

BALTIMORE HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with inclosures, an estimate from the Chief of Engineers of the cost of widening Baltimore Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

CONTRACTS BY THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of contracts made by the War Department and its bureaus for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1886; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and ordered to be printed.

PATRICK CORR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with inclosures, a letter from the Adjutant-General recommending that the salary of Patrick Corr, general-service clerk, be increased to $1,200 per annum; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SAINT MARY'S RIVER, MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with inclosures, an estimate from the Chief of Engineers of cost of improving Saint Mary's River, Michigan, and of continuing work on a new lock; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were read twice, and referred as indicated:

The bill (S. 3023) to authorize the Kansas, Texas and Southwestern Railway Company to build its road across the Fort Hays Military Reservation—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 3044) to provide for the execution of the provisions of article 2 of the treaty concluded between the United States of America and the Emperor of China on the 17th day of November, 1880, and proclaimed by the President of the United States on the 5th day of October, 1881—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The bill (S. 3050) granting a pension to Mary A. Logan—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill (S. 3087) to increase the pension of Mrs. Apolline A. Blair—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MINERAL LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 990) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, found to be mineral lands.

Mr. MORROW. I ask that that bill be placed on its passage. It has been before the Committee on Public Lands and is reported favorably.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Has that bill been considered by the committee of the House?

Mr. MORROW. It has. A similar bill has been considered by the committee of the House, and that bill is now on the House Calendar.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The bill was read twice, and was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. LOVERING, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Persis M. Thompson, no adverse report having been made thereon.

PRE-EMPTION OF PUBLIC LANDS, ETC.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. STRAIT, in place of Mr. PAYSON, absent, as a conferee on the bill (H. R. 7887) to repeal all laws providing for the pre-emption of the public lands, the laws allowing entries for timber-culture, and for other purposes.

MRS. FRANCES MARSHALL.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5262) for the relief of Mrs. Frances Marshall, and that the same be now considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Frances Marshall, widow of the late Humphrey Marshall, of Louisville, Ky., the sum of $1,800, being the amount covered into the Treasury about January 9, 1863, as the proceeds of said Humphrey Marshall's library, condemned in the United States district court for the southern district of Ohio under act of July 19, 1862.

The bill was reported by the Committee on War Claims with the following amendment:

In line 7 strike out "$1,800" and insert "$500."

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let the report be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa (interrupting the reading). That is sufficient.

Mr. BURROWS. Let the report be read through.

The report (by Mr. KLEINER) was read in full, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5262) for the relief of Mrs. Frances Marshall, having carefully considered the same and accompanying papers, submit the following report:

The facts out of which this claim against the United States arises are fully set forth in the affidavit of claimant, which is as follows:

"STATE OF KENTUCKY, County of Jefferson:

"The affiant, Frances E. Marshall, on her oath states that heretofore, to wit, in the year 1861, she was the sole and absolute owner of a large miscellaneous library, consisting of a great number of works from the pens of the most celebrated authors of ancient and modern times up to that time; that she is unable to give a full detailed statement of the names of the different authors or the titles of the books she owned; that her said library was most excellent and the books therein most elegantly bound, and her said library was of very great value; that her said library was packed in a great number of boxes and shipped from her country residence, 'Buckland Farm,' on the Kentucky River, the title of which was in her at that time, to Carrollton, Ky., for greater safety, the country being at that time full of soldiery and in a state of uncertainty; at that point affiant is informed they were afterward seized by the United States authorities and taken to Cincinnati, Ohio, and neighboring cities and sold at public auction, and the money or some part of it realized from the sale was forwarded to Washington, D. C., and paid into the Treasury of the United States, said money not by any means representing the value of her splendid library; that the statements contained in this the foregoing affidavit are true."

This affidavit is properly executed before a notary public of Jefferson County, Kentucky, and bears date of February 12, 1886.

Harvey M. Buckley, colonel of infantry in the Union Army, and others, in affidavits, fully substantiate the statement made by Mrs. Marshall.

The proof clearly shows that the library, or at least a large portion of it, belonged to and was purchased by Mrs. Marshall, and was her own separate property, held in her own right.

The committee are satisfied that the claimant was loyal to the United States Government.

Your committee therefore report the accompanying bill (H. R. 5262), with the following amendment: In lines 6 and 7, strike out the words "one thousand eight hundred," and insert the words "five hundred," and recommend that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALLOTMENT OF INDIAN LANDS IN SEVERALTY.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1577) and that the bill be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the Sac and Fox and Iowa reservations, in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That if any member of said Sac and Fox or Iowa tribe of Indians, properly enrolled at the Pottawatomie and Great Nemaha agency, shall elect to remain upon the reservation of his respective tribe, he shall be allowed to select an allotment of land in quantity as follows: If he be the head of a family, 160 acres; if a single person over eighteen years of age, or orphan child under eighteen years of age, 80 acres; and if a minor child under eighteen years of age, 40 acres; heads of families selecting land for themselves and minor children, and the United States Indian agent for orphan children. The lands so selected shall be held from sale as provided for herein, and shall be accepted at their fair valuation, to be ascertained by the Secretary of the Interior, in part satisfaction of his interest in and to said reservation, and of the moneys or fund realized from the sale thereof: Provided, That his right to share in the other funds and credits of the tribe shall not be impaired thereby; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause a patent to issue to each of the allottees, under the provisions of this act, and the act to which this act is an amendment, for the lands selected by or for such allottee, which patent shall be of the legal effect, and declare that the United States does and will hold the land thus patented for the period of twenty-five years, in trust for the sole use and benefit of the allottee, or, in case of his decease, of his heirs according to the laws of the State in which said land is situated, and that at the expiration of said period the United States will convey the same by patent to said Indian, or his heirs as aforesaid, in fee, discharged of said trust and free of all charge or incumbrance whatsoever; and if any conveyance shall be made of the lands thus allotted, or any contract made touching the same, before the expiration of the time above mentioned, such conveyance or contract shall be absolutely null and void; and such lands, during such time, shall not be subject to taxation, alienation, or forced sale, under execution or otherwise."

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief explanation of the bill, subject to objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman may proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. This Senate bill was prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, and was sent to the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress by the President in an executive message. It is to amend an act which was passed in 1885, giving to these Sac and Fox Indians allotments in severalty of their lands in Kansas, and providing for the sale of the excess. The act of 1885 did not provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to minors and orphans. The object of this amendment is to provide for allotments to them the same as to adults. The Commissioner finds difficulty in executing the present statute, and in his recent report he says that no attempt will be made to execute that statute until this amendment is made. Therefore it will be seen that it is upon the recommendation of the Interior Department that the amendment is asked for.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, WILMINGTON, N. C.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 229) and that the bill be taken up and passed with the amendments recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with a fire-proof vault extending to each story, for the accommodation of the post-office, custom-house, United States court-rooms, and other Government offices, at the city of Wilmington, in the State of North Carolina. The site and building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $200,000: Provided, That no money to be appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of North Carolina shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof: Provided, That the site on which the said building shall be erected shall be so selected as to leave an open space around the same of not less than 40 feet in width, including streets and alleys.

The amendments recommended by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds were read, as follows:

In line 12, strike out "two hundred" and insert "one hundred and fifty;" so as to make it read "$150,000."

After the word "dollars," in line 12, insert the following: "Nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which shall furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site nor plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $150,000."

In line 27, after the word "thereof," insert "for all purposes, except the administration of the criminal laws of said State, and the service of civil process therein."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BENNETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

H. K. BELDING.

Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 127) for the relief of H. K. Belding, and that the same be put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,566 to H. K. Belding, of Minnesota, the amount due him for carrying the mails of the United States between the years 1858 and 1862.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. DOUGHERTY) was read, as follows:

This claim was reported upon favorably by the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives at the first session of the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, and Forty-eighth Congresses, and passed the House of Representatives at the Forty-sixth Congress, and was reported upon favorably by the Senate Committee on Claims and passed the Senate at the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress. The report is as follows:

"They find that said H. K. Belding was contractor on mail-route No. 13585, from Brownsville, Minn., to Carimona, in the same State; that the contract was for four years from July 1, 1858. The contract price for carrying the mail on this route was $1,800 per annum. Mr. Belding performed the service under the contract until May, 1859, and was paid the contract price therefor. In 1859 there was a failure of sufficient appropriation for this route, and an order was issued by the Post-Office Department reducing the service on the same one-third.

"There was some correspondence between the contractor and the Post-Office Department about continuing the full service, and the contractor was informed there was no objection, except there was no money to pay until Congress convened and made an appropriation.

"Mr. Belding did perform full service from May 1, 1859, to October, 1860, and has received but two-thirds of the contract price therefor, and claims that having rendered the service in good faith he should receive the full compensation named in his contract.

"This full service was performed for seventeen months after the order of reduction, and at the contract rate Mr. Belding should have received $150 per month. He did receive but $100 per month, and he asks to be paid $50 per month additional, or $850 for the service so performed.

"The service having been performed with the knowledge of the Department and for the manifest benefit of the community, the committee think it just and equitable that Mr. Belding should be paid for the service actually performed the contract price for the same.

"They therefore recommend the payment to Mr. Belding of the sum of $850 for the seventeen months of service as above stated.

"Mr. Belding makes an additional claim, and the committee find the following facts:

"Prior to the 1st of October, 1860, the route from Brownsville to Carimona was extended, and the contract with Belding annulled. Mr. Belding complained to the Department that he had left a good business and made large investments to perform his contract, and would suffer very great injury if compelled to give it up. He was informed that he would be reinstated and his contract renewed. The service at this time was lessened 5 miles at one end of the route and increased 12 miles at the other, and the compensation was increased $110 per year.

"Negotiations continued between Mr. Belding and the Post-Office Department from October 1, 1860, to February 14, 1861, four months and fourteen days, when the contract was renewed with Mr. Belding. During this four months and fourteen days Mr. Belding performed the service and has received no pay therefor. This route over which Mr. Belding performed the service had been included in a much larger one, and let to other parties. They never performed any service upon it, but collected the pay under their contract for the service performed by Mr. Belding.

"It clearly appearing that the original contract with Mr. Belding was annulled for no fault or omission on his part; that he continued to perform the service in good faith under the assurance that he would be reinstated; that his doing so was well known to the Post-Office Department, and that he was subsequently reinstated, we are of the opinion that the payment to other parties for this service, under the circumstances, should not relieve the Government from paying Mr. Belding therefor. We therefore report back the bill without amendment, said bill including payment of the two sums allowed by the committee, and recommend that the bill pass."

Your committee concur in the above report and recommendations, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES M. GRIGSBY.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6312) for the relief of James M. Grigsby, and that the same be put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to adjust and settle the claim of James M. Grigsby, late postmaster at Montague, Tex., for money-order funds lost in transit through the mails, notwithstanding the provisions of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Postmaster-General to adjust certain claims of postmasters for loss by burglary, fire, or other unavoidable casualty," approved March 17, 1882.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. LANHAM) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred House bill 6312, for the relief of James M. Grigsby, find that the said Grigsby was postmaster at Montague, Tex.; that on the 26th of October, 1883, said postmaster transmitted $25, money-order funds, to the postmaster at Sherman, Tex., in registered package No. 46. The deputy postmaster testifies under oath that he placed the money in the registered package, properly sealed and directed to the postmaster at Sherman, Tex., and placed the same in a mail pouch, locked it, and delivered to the mail-carrier on the route. These facts are testified to by another witness, who swears the same was done in his presence.

The postmasters at Saint Joe and Marysville, the next two offices on the route, swear that the package No. 46 passed through their offices in good condition. The postmaster at Gainesville swears that the package was not received at that office, and further certifies that the United States mail was robbed on the evening of the 26th of October, 1883, between Marysville and Gainesville. The postmaster at Sherman certifies that the registered package No. 46 and funds were not received at his office.

The postmaster at Montague swears that at the time of his next weekly statement after the robbery he notified the Superintendent of the Money-Order Bureau of the Post-Office Department of the loss, and asked a credit for the same. He gave the Department no further notice.

The funds in this case were properly transmitted, and that the United States mail was robbed is abundantly sustained by the evidence, and the claim would have been allowed under the act of March 17, 1882, if the postmaster had notified the Postmaster-General within three months after the loss; but, instead, the postmaster notified the Superintendent of Money-Order Offices at the Department at his next weekly statement, which was in time, but directed it to the wrong authority.

Although the sum is small, in view of all the facts, we believe the claimant should be relieved.

Therefore the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THROCKMORTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES M. M'KAMEY.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5775) for the relief of James M. McKamey, and that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the record of James M. McKamey, late of Company E, Third Regiment Tennessee Infantry Volunteers, who is reported to have deserted from his command, captured by the enemy at the battle of Richmond, Kentucky, and to discharge him therefrom as of the day before the date of his muster as a first lieutenant and recruiting officer for the Eleventh Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, and also to muster him as a lieutenant as aforesaid from the 1st day of October, 1862, and to discharge him from this last service as on the 1st day of November, 1864, that his record may be made consistent with the facts proven.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. HOUK) was read, as follows:

That on the 12th of February, 1862, Mr. McKamey enlisted as a private in Company E, Third Tennessee Infantry, and was mustered into the service and served as such until the 26th day of August, 1862, when, at the battle of Richmond, Ky., he was made a prisoner of war; that in that engagement the detachment of his regiment with which he was engaged was so utterly routed it was weeks before a sufficient number of the survivors of that detachment could be gotten together for the purpose of forming a reorganization and rejoining their regiment.

That shortly after Mr. McKamey's capture he was paroled, and while on his way to join his regiment he was commissioned second lieutenant and recruiting officer for the Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry, under and by virtue of authority of Andrew Johnson, then military war governor of Tennessee; that upon the 1st of October, 1862, he entered upon and continued to discharge his duties as such until the 1st of November, 1864, when the Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry, by consolidation, became merged into the Ninth Tennessee Cavalry, and that in the apportionment of officers under the consolidation Mr. McKamey was left out; that on the 8th of November, 1864, he enlisted as sergeant, Company I, Seventh Tennessee Mounted Infantry, and faithfully served in that capacity until the 27th of July, 1865, when he was discharged; that the charge of desertion made against Mr. McKamey, on the 24th of August, 1862, was erroneously made; that instead of being a deserter he was a prisoner of war.

Touching Mr. McKamey's commission as second lieutenant and recruiting officer, although the records in the Department do not show the fact, yet there is abundant evidence to warrant your committee in finding that he was commissioned, and that he did serve as such second lieutenant and recruiting officer of the Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry from the 1st of October, 1862, to the 1st of November, 1864—evidence of officers and soldiers who saw and inspected his commission, and knew of the performance of service by him under that commission, which fact, coupled with his imprisonment, no doubt gave color to the charge of desertion which was made of record against him.

In view of these facts, your committee beg leave to recommend that the prayer of Mr. McKamey's petition be granted, and that the accompanying bill for his relief be passed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOUK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A. F. & N. C. SAINT JOHN.

Mr. TRIGG. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5131) for the relief of A. F. & N. C. Saint John, and that it be now put on its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay A. F. & N. C. Saint John, of Smyth County, Virginia, the sum of $54.33, with interest from the 30th day of October, 1865, the value of subsistence stores furnished to the Army of the United States in October, 1865, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated or that may be hereafter appropriated for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BRAGG. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. TRIGG) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred House bill 5131, beg leave to report that upon investigation of the facts they ascertain that on or about the 15th day of October, 1865, and some months after the close of the late war between the States, the claimants, A. F. & N. C. Saint John, of Smyth County, Virginia, furnished to Capt. George C. Gibbs, provost-marshal, and in command of a company of United States cavalry then stationed at Marion, Va., 155½ dozen oats of the value of 35 cents per dozen, making the sum of $54.33. When the company left this section all similar bills that were presented were paid; but these claimants failed to present this bill, and it has never been paid.

Your committee recommend its payment without interest, and recommend that the bill be amended by striking from it the words "with interest from the 30th October, 1865."

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the House proceeded to consider the same.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Claims, to strike out, in lines 6 and 7, the words "with interest from the 30th day of October, 1865," was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TRIGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CAMDEN, N. J.

Mr. HIRES. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 228) for the erection of a public building at Camden, N. J., and that the House now proceed to consider the same.

The bill was read.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report read.

The report was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I desire to ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HIRES] whether there is a United States court held at the place named in this bill.

Mr. HIRES. No, sir; not at present.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the regular order.

ENGROSSED COPY OF A BILL.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Senate be requested to send to the House a duplicate copy of Senate bill No. 938, for the relief of Chittenden Brothers, which passed the Senate August 4, 1886, the original engrossed copy of said bill having been lost.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 1085) for the relief of Albion S. Keith; and

A bill (H. R. 5692) for the relief of James B. Russell.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the regular order is the call of committees for reports of bills of a private nature.

Mr. HATCH. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 57, noes 60.

The SPEAKER proceeded to call the committees for reports.

CLEMENTINE HARTINGER.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10025) granting a pension to Clementine Hartinger; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calender, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ELIZA J. BELL.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9490) for the relief of Eliza J. Bell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SARAH E. NORTON.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (S. 2699) granting a pension to Sarah E. Norton; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. HAYNES, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 1022) granting a pension to Mary E. Baker;

A bill (H. R. 7568) granting a pension to Ira Colburn;

A bill (H. R. 3542) granting a pension to Charles E. Mudgett; and

A bill (H. R. 5471) granting a pension to John B. Hays.

GEORGE W. DE MOTTE.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 791) granting a pension to George W. De Motte; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM F. HARMON.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back favorably the bill (S. 1642) granting a pension to William F. Harmon; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. H. PRICE.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back favorably the bill (S. 2369) granting an increase of pension to William H. H. Price; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHARLES G. PARIS.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back favorably the bill (S. 1673) granting a pension to Charles G. Paris; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. LANDES, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid upon the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 4591) granting a disability pension to Nathaniel Moody; and

A bill (H. R. 3406) granting a pension to Jacob Copes.

M. LOUISE BUTLER.

On motion of Mr. STRUBLE, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of a bill (S. 773) granting a pension to M. Louise Butler; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

BARTOLA THEBANT.

Mr. STRUBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, also reported back favorably a bill (S. 2151) to pension Bartola Thebant, a soldier in the Florida Seminole Indian war of 1849 and 1850; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompaning report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. STRUBLE. I have some adverse reports to make, and in deference to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] I ask that the first bill, instead of being laid upon the table, be placed upon the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. It is a Senate bill, and the Chair will state to the gentleman it is customary to place such bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. STRUBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (S. 2217) for the relief of Andrew T. McReynolds;
A bill (S. 1103) granting a pension to Caroline E. French;
A bill (S. 1214) granting a pension to Reamus G. Morris;
A bill (S. 1463) granting arrears of pension to Mary Helena Mahan;
A bill (H. R. 1559) for the relief of Fordyce Foster; and
A bill (H. R. 9897) for the relief of Zemia Shepherd.

WILLIAM J. POITEVENT.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. 10148) for the relief of William J. Poitevent; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PIROMIS H. BELL.

Mr. PERRY, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably a bill (H. R. 8079) for the relief of Piromis H. Bell, administrator of Marcus A. Bell, deceased, and others; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM TABB.

Mr. KLEINER, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably a bill (S. 1310) for the relief of William Tabb; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JACOB MATHIS.

On motion of Mr. LYMAN, the Committee on War Claims was discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. 2832) for the relief of Jacob Mathis; and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The call of committees for reports was then concluded.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HATCH. I move to dispense with the business on the Private Calendar for to-day. [Cries of "No!"]

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. But before that question is put I offer the following resolution in reference to the mode of procedure in the consideration of the bills when we get into Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That when the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar the bills shall be taken up in their order; but if the consideration of any bill is objected to it shall be laid aside for this day, but not lose its place on the Calendar, and the committee shall proceed to consider the next bill. When objection is made to the consideration of any bill such objection shall not be withdrawn during the day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. OATES. I object.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Is objection made?

Mr. SPRINGER. The bill which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] desires to reach is not in the Committee of the Whole, but has been reported from that committee, and is now before the House.

Mr. OATES. If this resolution does not apply to that bill I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. ELY. I renew the objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I ask unanimous consent to pass this order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Friday, the 14th day of January, 1887, after the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of Senate bills on the Private Calendar of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I insist upon my motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OATES. Before the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole——

The SPEAKER. But the House has resolved to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. OATES. I wish to raise a question of order as to a bill on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the bill to which the gentleman doubtless refers was, by an order of the House, postponed until Friday, July 30. On that day no action whatever was taken in regard to it, and therefore it becomes unfinished business and comes up for consideration when the committee rises to-day.

Mr. OATES. That is what I wanted to ascertain—the status of that bill.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4840) to confirm a certain private-land claim in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. HALSELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that at the last session of Congress there was a general bill passed by the House embracing this and the three following bills on the Calendar, but which has not yet been acted upon by the Senate. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that this bill and the three immediately following it be laid aside informally, not to lose their places on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2140) for the relief of the Columbia Bank in Pennsylvania.

Mr. HIESTAND. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JOHN R. HARRINGTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1773) for the relief of James J. Johnston.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask unanimous consent to substitute for this bill a bill which is on the same page of the Calendar, a few lines further down, the bill (H. R. 4594) for the relief of John R. Harrington. I ask to lay this bill aside informally with a view to taking up and considering the other in its place.

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That John R. Harrington have leave to apply to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension for the term of seven years of the reissued letters patent numbered 2415 and 2416, each dated December 11, 1866, for improvements in carpet-lining and means for producing the same, from and after his decision thereon; such application to the Commissioner of Patents to be made within three months from and after the date of the passage of this act, and the proceedings before said Commissioner to be made to conform to the statute relating to the extension of letters patent granted for the term of fourteen years.

SEC. 2. That no right of action to recover damage shall accrue to the patentee, or his assignee, from the time of the expiration of said patents until the extension as contemplated by the first section of this act.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. LEHLBACH) was read, as follows:

The committee adopts the House report No. 2592, Forty-eighth Congress, second session, as follows:

"That the applicant is an old man and entirely blind, and has been so during the greater portion of the lifetime of the patents, and for this reason he failed to realize any adequate compensation for his invention and expenses.

"The invention consists in the improvement of carpet-lining, and is a foundation one, and of great merit. It appears that the most influential dealers in the carpet trade in all parts of the United States have petitioned for renewal of the patents to the said John R. Harrington, and that the manufacturers are in favor of the same.

"No opposition appears to be made to the granting of the relief prayed for by the applicant. The committee are confident from all the evidence that the failure to obtain compensation is not from any neglect or default of the applicant."

The committee recommend an amendment to the bill by striking out all of section 1, after the word "act," in line 11, and inserting as follows:

"And the Commissioner of Patents is hereby authorized and empowered to renew and extend to said John R. Harrington each of said patents for the term of seven years from and after his decision thereon, with the same force and effect as if each of said patents had been originally granted for the term of seven years from the date of his decision thereon, if, in his judgment, the same should be renewed and extended."

The committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as amended.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SOWDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the next business on the Calendar, being the joint resolution No. 60, be laid aside informally, not to lose its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the next bill on the Calendar (H. R. 4235), reported adversely from the Committee on Military Affairs, be laid aside informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

WILLIAM PIKE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 527) for the relief of William Pike.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William Pike, of Tipton County, in the State of Indiana, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $850, for money paid by said Pike for a substitute during the late war.

Mr. WARD, of Indiana. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. KLEINER) is as follows:

The committee find the facts to be as stated in House report No. 2115, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, which report is hereto annexed and made a part of this report, and is as follows:

"The claimant was, about the middle of November, 1864, at the county of Tipton, in the then eleventh Congressional district of Indiana, drafted into the military service of the United States, pursuant to the act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, for 'enrolling and calling out the national forces.' Immediately upon being so drafted he procured one Thomas O. Bosworth to go as his substitute' and paid said Bosworth for going into the military service of the Government, as such substitute for said claimant, the sum of $850. It appears clearly from the evidence that said Thomas O. Bosworth was duly accepted by the Government authorities as such substitute, was mustered into the naval service of the United States as such substitute, and so served until the close of the war. But, notwithstanding these facts, the said claimant, after he had furnished said substitute, was compelled, under the same draft, against his will and over his protest, to enter the military service of the United States and serve until the 3d day of April, 1865, at which time he was honorably discharged. The evidence clearly shows that the claimant was compelled to perform this service for the Government without any fault or negligence on his part, but solely through the mistake or fraud of the agents of the Government, and that he has never been repaid, from any source, any part of the said sum of $850, which he was compelled to expend in order to procure said substitute.

"Your committee have no hesitation, under the facts, in recommending that said claimant be allowed and paid the said sum of $850. They accordingly report in favor of the passage of the bill."

Your committee therefore adopt said House report as the report of this committee, and report the accompanying bill (H. R. 527) for his relief, with recommendation that it pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE W. BALDWIN AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 529) for the relief of George W. Baldwin, Charles L. Baldwin, and Dora Thompson.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to George W. Baldwin, Charles L. Baldwin, and Dora Thompson (the only heirs at law of William F. Baldwin, deceased), of Tipton County, in the State of Indiana, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $850, for money paid by the said William F. Baldwin for a substitute during the late war for the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside.

Mr. PETERS. Let us have the report read, or at least some explanation as to why this man should be paid.

The report (by Mr. KLEINER) was read, as follows:

The committee find the facts to be as stated in House Report No. 2117, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, which report is hereto annexed and made a part of this report, and is as follows:

"The claimants are, respectively, in the order in which their names appear in the bill, the father, brother, and sister of William F. Baldwin, deceased, and they are all of full age. The said decedent, William F. Baldwin, was, about the middle of November, 1864, at the county of Tipton, in the State of Indiana, in the then Eleventh Congressional district of said State, drafted into the military service of the United States, pursuant to the act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, 'for enrolling and calling out the national forces.' Immediately upon being so drafted, he procured one Timothy O. Reagan to go as his substitute, and paid said Reagan for going into the military service of the Government, as such substitute for said decedent, the sum of $850.

"It appears clearly from the evidence that said Timothy O. Reagan was duly accepted by the Government authorities as such substitute, that he was mustered into the naval service as such substitute, and so served until the close of the war. But, notwithstanding these facts, the said decedent, after he had furnished said substitute, was compelled, under the same draft, against his will, and over his protest, to enter the military service of the United States (being assigned to the Twenty-third Regiment of Indiana Volunteers), and served until the 16th day of February, 1865, at which time, and when still in the service, he died. The evidence clearly shows that the decedent was compelled to perform this service for the Government without any fault or negligence on his part, but solely through the mistake or fraud of the agents of the Government, and that neither he nor the claimants, or any of them, who are his sole heirs at law, have ever been paid by any one, or from any source, any part of the said sum of $850 which decedent was compelled to expend in order to procure said substitute.

"Your committee have no hesitation, under the facts, in recommending that said claimants, as such heirs at law of said decedent, be allowed and paid the said sum of $850. They accordingly report in favor of the passage of the bill."

Your committee therefore adopt said House report as the report of this committee, and report the accompanying bill (H. R. 529) for their relief with recommendation that it pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 7.

Mr. O'FERRALL. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. O'FERRALL and Mr. WARD, of Indiana, were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes 19.

Mr. O'FERRALL (one of the tellers). I will withdraw the call for a quorum, and when the question comes up in the House I will ask for the yeas and nays.

So (further count not being called for) the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN M. HIGGINS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 940) for the relief of John M. Higgins, reported by the Committee on War Claims with an adverse recommendation.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $3,600 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay John M. Higgins for horses, mules, hogs, cattle, pork, corn, wheat, and other supplies taken and used by the United States Army in 1862, 1863, and 1864; and the Treasurer of the United States is hereby instructed to pay the amount herein named to the order of the said Higgins.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I move that the bill be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. EDEN. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. GEDDES) was read, as follows:

The claimant in this case seeks compensation for property owned by him in the month of June, 1864, at Dalton, Ga. He says it was worth $3,550, and that the same was taken from him by the Army of the United States under the command of Lieutenant Haste, of Indiana, and Colonel Laibolot, of the Second Regiment of Missouri Volunteers. He avers that he was loyal to the Government of the United States.

Conceding this claim to be correctly stated, as matter of fact no compensation can be allowed for the loss. It was property held and owned in an insurrectionary State, and was seized during active hostilities. All the general legislation of Congress has been against allowing this class of claims, and your committee see no good reason for a change of that policy. There is nothing so exceptional in this case as to warrant your committee in departing from the general rule, and therefore recommend that the bill in this case do lie upon the table.

The views of the minority (presented by Mr. STONE, of Kentucky) were read, as follows:

I do not concur in the report of the majority of the Committee on War Claims in the case of John M. Higgins.

W. J. STONE.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the bill be laid aside with the recommendation that it do lie on the table.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, this bill comes here with an adverse report or a statement that the claim should not be paid on account of the simple fact that it originated, as claimed in the majority report, in the State of Georgia. I am aware of the fact it has been the custom not to pay claims of this character originating in States declared to be in rebellion. But here the facts and the state of the case are very different from cases of this kind that the Congress of the United States has refused to pay.

Mr. Higgins was a citizen of the State of Kentucky. He moved to the State of Alabama in 1860 and took this property with him from Kentucky to Alabama. When the war broke out, or when it became evident to Mr. Higgins that war was to break out, he made his arrangements to move his property back to Kentucky, not having become properly a citizen of Alabama. He went to Kentucky and made his arrangements to move back there, and went to Alabama for the property. He started for Kentucky but found it impossible to pass through the lines and stopped for the time being in the State of Georgia. When the United States Army reached Dalton, Ga., where Mr. Higgins was located, they took his property by order of officers of the United States Army and appropriated it to the use of the army. These facts are clearly proven in the evidence, and beyond that the loyalty of Mr. Higgins is not disputed. It is thoroughly established by the proof furnished in the papers. And I hold that Mr. Higgins was virtually a citizen of Kentucky, a State not in rebellion; that he was loyal to the United States Government; and that his property ought to be paid for. If property of loyal citizens is paid for anywhere the property of Mr. Higgins should be paid for.

The Congress of the United States has paid many claims of this kind. The Forty-ninth Congress has passed bills paying many claims that were not anything like as just as this. Justice demands that this claim be paid by this Government.

Mr. EDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDEN. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky why Mr. Higgins did not present his claim to the commissioner of claims who had jurisdiction over claims of this sort in the insurrectionary States?

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. He was then a citizen of Kentucky and was not aware of the remedy he had.

Mr. SPRINGER. This bill comes clearly within the rule laid down by the committees both of this House and of the Senate in regard to unauthorized depredations by Federal troops during the late war and should not be paid. If it is it opens up a class of cases the cost of the payment of which is beyond the comprehension of any one.

I have in my hand the report of this Committee on War Claims of the House in the case of Frederick Klor, one of my constituents. I introduced a bill in behalf of this claimant at the first session of this Congress. It was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and on the 9th of March last was reported back with the recommendation that it do not pass. I desire to read the report in that case, which is very brief, in order to show the line of decisions which this committee is following:

The claim in this case comes clearly within the principle involved in numerous cases reported by your committee to the present Congress. It clearly appears that the loss was the result of the unauthorized depredations of Federal troops.

Your committee therefore feel compelled, in pursuance of past Congressional action, to report adversely, and recommend that the bill do lie on the table.

This claimant resided in Sangamon County, Illinois. These depredations were perpetrated in that county. The party never was inside of an insurrectionary district. The property never was there. It was a matter which occurred entirely in a Northern State where there were no operations of war within two or three hundred miles. But the property was taken without lawful authority, and it was therefore denominated a depredation by Federal troops unauthorized by any officer of the Army.

This case is not as strong as the other. It is a case simply of a loss in the midst of war, such a loss as is inevitable in the movements of armies; simply a destruction of property as the armies marched on and as battles took place.

It could not have been avoided, and all such cases as that have been rejected heretofore by both Houses of Congress. I do not remember that any case of the kind has passed this House since I have been a member of Congress. There have been cases passed where the question was in dispute whether they came within this category or not, but here is a case where there is no dispute about the fact or as to the nature of the loss.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] wholly misstates the case. He undertakes to draw a parallel between this and the case of a depredation committed by soldiers in Illinois. This was not a case of depredation; this was not a case of the wanton destruction of property. The proof in this case is that the property was taken under the orders of United States officers and used for the benefit of the United States.

The chairman of the Committee on War Claims, who is as careful a man upon questions of this character as can be found in the House, can find no objection to this bill, except the fact that the property at the time it was taken was in the State of Georgia. But the House will remember that this property was taken and used for army purposes; so that it is not at all like the case in the State of Illinois which has been cited here, where the soldiers went out and took property as depredators without any authority from anybody. I do not believe there is a member of the Committee on War Claims who would have the audacity to ask that one of his constituents should be paid for losses resulting from depredations; but in this case the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who is the peculiar guardian of the Treasury, who wants to be considered the lock to the money-box—that gentleman comes in here and objects to the payment of this just claim for property which was taken by the United States troops and was used for the maintenance of the United States Army, and he wants such a claim as this rejected because a claim that he has made for the unauthorized taking of some chickens and fence-rails by soldiers in Illinois has been refused payment! Now, I ask this House whether it is just or fair that because this property, owned by a loyal man, happened to be within an insurrectionary State—not permanently there—the owner of it, as I have said, a loyal citizen of a State not in insurrection—payment shall be refused.

I ask gentlemen to say whether it is fair or just that, simply because of his misfortune in being unable to get this property within the limits of a State still in the Union and which never attempted to go out, whether it is just that this man's misfortune shall operate to his injury and to the loss of his property, when other people who did not happen to be so situated are being paid for their property taken in like manner.

He was virtually a citizen of Kentucky. He was really and truly a loyal man. Testimony to this man's loyalty is on file from men of as undoubted loyalty as any that ever the flag of the Union waved over. There is no question about the propriety of the claim except as to the point of the property having been temporarily in the State of Georgia; but the property was taken by the Army and used for army purposes, and there is no parallel whatever between this case and a case referred to in the State of Illinois, where "the boys" went out and took a few chickens that they happened to find roosting conveniently. [Laughter.] I hope the motion of the gentleman will be voted down, and that Mr. Higgins, a good and loyal citizen of Kentucky, will receive justice from this Forty-ninth Congress of the United States.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of pain to efforts that have been made here at this late day to stain the character of men who believed in the Union, simply because they happened to live at the South. I, for one, would like to know, and the people of this country would like to know, sir, whether it is a crime for a Union man to have lived in a disunion State during the time of war. That is the question. It brings itself down to that. It is admitted, even by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], that the claimant in this case was loyal to his country, that the Union forces did take his property, and that it was taken by authority. Now the question is, shall he be paid for that property? I stand not here, sir, to quibble with any gentleman as to whether the property was taken in the State of Georgia or in the State of Kentucky. What is the difference? A Union man, a man devoted to his country, a man who loved the flag of the United States, has his property taken from him by the Union forces by direction of Union officers, and used for the purposes of the Government, and now when he comes and asks for payment shall this great Government, in this day of peace, refuse to compensate that man?

There was a contest in our country—I remember it well—and the State of Georgia said she would go out of the Union. We said she should not go out; we said those States could not go out; we said that secession was unconstitutional; we said that disunion was wrong. We went to war about it; and there were some noble hearts in Georgia that loved the old flag, that loved the land of their fathers, that loved the history and the memory of Washington, and they said, "Although Georgia may go out, we will not go out." Among them was this brave man, a good man, a true man, who stood by his country. You went to him in the name of the Union; you robbed him in the name of the Union; and now in time of peace, when the contest is over and he comes to this great Government that robbed him and says, "Pay me for my property; I am a Union man; I was always a Union man; I love my country; I always loved it"—when this Union man comes here and presents this just claim, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois says: "Oh, Congress has passed a rule that they will not pass bills for the payment of claims of this kind." Do you tell me that Congress passed a rule to defy the Constitution of my country, to disinherit the loyal men of the South who stood true to the Union? Congress had no right to adopt such a rule. It is usurpation on the part of anybody to undertake to pass such a rule. I say—and I hope the House will listen to me—Congress can pass no rule to prevent a Representative here from voting for the righteous claim of a loyal man. I hope that when we come to vote upon this question the report of the committee will be disregarded, and that justice will be done to a true, devoted, gallant, Union-loving man, who happened to be caught in Georgia during the war. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, there are doubtless a great many of these cases which may be selected from the mass, and which may appear to have some considerations of equity in their support; but when the Government has drawn a line in accordance with which it will pay or refuse payment in the case of war claims, it becomes the duty of a committee of this House to confine itself within the rule. Here is a claim for property which was taken in the State of Georgia—an insurrectionary State. We are prohibited from paying for it by an act of Congress; and by the rulings of the War Claims Committee claims of this kind have always been rejected.

In this case the attempt is made to escape the operation of the rule by saying that the claimant was a resident of the State of Kentucky, which was never declared in rebellion; that, for the purpose of following the pursuits of a farmer in the State of Georgia, he had taken certain articles of personal property there. But he voluntarily took his property beyond the line within which the Government guaranteed him protection; by his own volition he was with his property in an insurrectionary State for the purpose of gain. The property having been taken under such circumstances, the case comes clearly within the rule.

I see no more reason why this man should be paid for his property than that every loyal man who lost property in Georgia under like circumstances should be paid. If in this case you abandon the rule and pay this man for his property you open the door for the payment of every loyal man whose property was taken in an insurrectionary State. Congress has already gone far enough in the direction of paying claims which are not authorized, claims which have arisen in insurrectionary States. It is time that we should call a halt, that we should follow the law and adhere to the rulings made by both Houses of Congress upon these war claims. I hope that the motion to report the bill to the House with a recommendation that it be laid on the table will be agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, one word in response to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE]. The claim to which I referred as having arisen in the State of Illinois was the taking of property by the Army in a State which was not in insurrection. That property, as no one disputes, was used for the purposes of the Army. It was a case where the troops went out into the fields and took corn and hay, the produce of a man's farm, which was carried into camp and used. No vouchers were given. The case came within the ordinary operations of soldiers in camp, where requisitions for supplies were not made.

In the present case, the Army, in the midst of hostilities, passed through a hostile district of country. The claimant had his property there before the Army came; and when the Army had passed he had not the property. That is all he can say about the matter. Now, if it had been taken regularly, according to the forms of law, a voucher would have been given and the claimant could have gone long ago, under the general law, to the Claims Commission and secured the payment of his claim. This not having been done, the case belongs to another class, as to which it has been the rule of Congress heretofore not to make payment. If Congress is disposed in the present case to open this wide door, then a number of cases which have been reported here adversely should be sent back to the War Claims Committee; we should reverse the action adopted by Congress up to the present time, and should begin the payment of a class of claims which will involve an expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars. I submit that the committee has drawn the line at the right place, and it behooves us to maintain that line unbroken. Here is a case which comes within the class heretofore rejected; and I hope the vote of the House will be unanimous against the payment of this claim.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I wish to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to one remark of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. The only objection which he seems to urge against the payment of this claim is the fact that a certain claim for depredations in the State of Illinois was not paid. The gentleman says that the present case originated in the midst of hostilities; that Mr. Higgins had the property before the Army passed through that district of country, and after the Army had gone his property was not there. The gentleman takes it for granted that the taking of the property was what is known as a "depredation;" in other words, to put the matter plainly, that the soldiers stole the property. That was not the fact. The property was taken and used by the officers of the Army for the support of the Army. The property when taken was in Georgia; but Mr. Higgins was a resident of Kentucky; his real home was there; and he had been endeavoring to get his property into Kentucky. Now, suppose he had been enabled to cross the line with his property; suppose he had succeeded in getting back to his home and then had lost his property under similar circumstances; the committee, instead of making a report against this bill, would have reported in its favor. The whole objection to this claim is based upon the fact that the property when it was taken and used by the Army was in the State of Georgia. Now, if you are going to pay for property used by the Army when that property belonged to loyal men who lived in a State not in insurrection, why should you not pay Mr. Higgins?

As I have said, after all the straining to find a reason why this claim should not be paid, the whole objection rests upon the fact that the property, when taken, was in the State of Georgia, and the further fact, urged by the gentleman from Illinois, that a claim for depredations in the State of Illinois was not paid. I ask this Committee of the Whole whether these are valid objections.

There is no "opening a door" in this case. Congress is asked simply to follow exactly the line in which it has been going for the last twenty years; that is, paying claims of this kind when they could be brought up for consideration, and when the justice of the claim and the loyalty of the party were established. Whenever that could be done, you have been paying claims of this kind ever since 1864. Why stickle now about this case, and refuse payment, simply because the property was taken in the State of Georgia? There is no "opening a flood-gate" in this case. This talk about "opening a door" and "opening a flood-gate" is used to scare Representatives here from the payment of just claims. Why not promptly do justice to one of your citizens when the facts have been established in his case just as they have in hundreds of other cases which have been paid? I can see no reason why this bill should be rejected, and I hope the Committee of the Whole will report it favorably to the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. One moment, Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken. The committee reporting this bill uses this language:

It was property held and owned in an insurrectionary State, and was seized during active hostilities. All the general legislation of Congress has been against allowing this class of claims, and your committee see no reason for change in that policy. There is nothing so exceptional in this case as to warrant your committee in departing from the general rule, and therefore recommend the bill in this case do lie upon the table.

That is the report of every member of the Committee on War Claims with the exception of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE], who gives us the views of the minority:

I do not concur in the report of the majority of the committee in the case of John M. Higgins.

Now, if the gentleman from Kentucky wished to have enlightened the House in the minority report which he presented he might have stated the facts in the case, showing in what respect the report of the majority of the committee had misrepresented them. But there is no dispute about the facts at all. The committee reported the facts unanimously, and the gentleman from Kentucky does not dispute them. These facts as reported show that this property was seized in the midst of active hostilities. Such a case has never heretofore been allowed by this Congress, and in my judgment never will be.

Mr. RYAN. Let us have a vote.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. There is no necessity, Mr. Chairman, for anything like an extended statement of the facts in the report of the minority, as there is no disagreement in the committee as to the facts of the case. There is no denial in this case of the fact that Mr. Higgins lived in Kentucky, nor that the property when taken was in Georgia. Neither is there denial of the fact this property was taken and used for the benefit of the United States Army. Those are the facts in the case, and there is no dispute about them.

But, sir, the majority of the committee decided the claim should not be paid simply because the property was in the State of Georgia. That is where the disagreement is. There is no disagreement as to any other point.

I do not concur with the majority report, because I believe the property belonging to a man who lived in Kentucky, although that property was in the State of Georgia, should be paid for when taken by the Government just as quickly as if it had been across the line. There is no question about his loyalty—that was established by the testimony of men whose loyalty has never been questioned.

The question recurred on Mr. SPRINGER'S motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation it be laid upon the table.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 37.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN appointed as tellers Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. STONE, of Kentucky.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 54.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I will withdraw the point of no quorum, and give notice I shall call for the yeas and nays on the question in the House.

So Mr. SPRINGER'S motion was agreed to; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

CLAIM FOR TONNAGE DUES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4583) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make final adjustment of claims of certain foreign steamship companies arising from the illegal exaction of tonnage dues.

It was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to allow and pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the North German Lloyd Steamship Company of Bremen, the Hamburg American Packet Company of Hamburg, and the Norse American Line of Sweden, interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on such moneys as have been exacted from such companies in contravention of treaty provisions, and heretofore refunded under the act of June 19, 1878; such interest to be computed from the date of the respective payments by such companies up to the time of refunding the same under the act aforesaid: Provided, however, That such interest shall be accepted by said companies, respectively, in full settlement of all claims on account of said moneys exacted from them in contravention of treaty provisions, as above stated.

Mr. SOWDEN. I ask for the reading of the report of the committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Allow me to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this report occupies eleven pages of fine type, and that even if the report were read, because of matters which have transpired since it was made, it would be necessary for me to make a statement. I suggest, therefore, that I be allowed to make such a statement, and then if the gentleman wishes to do so he can insist upon the reading of the report.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the reading of all these reports. This is an old case; I am familiar with it, having served on the Foreign Affairs Committee. The principal was paid on this claim. This is a claim for interest. I ask my friend what is the amount?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The interest computed upon the principal was, upon one series of these claims, a little rising $80,000, and on another series a little over $70,000; but this computation was at the rate of 6 per cent., whereas the bill provides for only 5. I suppose, however, if the reading of the report is insisted upon it may as well be read previous to any debate, but not in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest, in view of the fact that this is a very lengthy report, and as the House has been in session some time this morning, that by unanimous consent this case be allowed to go over until next Friday, retaining its place on the Calendar, so that it may come up for action early in the day.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2175) for the relief of Dr. W. S. Hosack.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over to retain its place on the Calendar without prejudice.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ELON A. MARSH AND MINARD LAFEVER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5894) for the relief of Elon A. Marsh and Minard Lafever.

The bill is as follows:

Whereas heretofore, to wit, on the 28th day of December, A. D. 1880, in due form of procedure and in all legal respects, letters patent numbered 236052 of the United States of America were duly granted and issued to Elon A. Marsh and his assignee, Minard Lafever, of Battle Creek, in the county of Calhoun and State of Michigan, one of the United States, for a new and useful improvement in steam-engine valve-gear, save that the said letters patent were not, by accident or mistake, at the said time of issuing, to wit, on the 28th day of December, 1880, signed, as by law required, by the Secretary of the Interior; and

Whereas the said named letters patent were afterward, to wit, on the 24th day of February, A. D. 1882, but not before, duly signed by the then Acting Secretary of the Interior: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the letters patent named in the preamble of this act are hereby and by this act made legal, valid, complete, and operative, in law and equity, from the 28th day of December, 1880, to the same extent and for the same term that the same would have been legal, valid, complete, and operative if the signature of the Secretary of the Interior had, at the time of the supposed issue of said letters patent on the day aforesaid, been placed thereon, and the omission of said signature thereon had not occurred.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the report be read.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the views of the minority be read in that case.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. MORGAN. I think, Mr. Chairman, it would perhaps obviate the necessity of reading the two reports if I may be permitted to make a brief statement. After a consultation with the members constituting the majority of the committee they agree that the amendment suggested by the minority may be incorporated in the bill. If that amendment is adopted as a part of the bill it will obviate our objections and save the reading of the reports.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

We therefore respectfully recommend that the bill be amended by adding at the end thereof the following proviso, to wit:

"Provided, however, That the provisions of this act shall not be held or construed to apply to or affect any suits now pending, nor any cause of action arising prior to its passage."

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to have the body of the bill read again.

The bill was again read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SAMUEL H. MOER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3365) for the relief of the heirs or legal representative of Samuel H. Moer.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they hereby are, authorized and directed, in the settlement and adjustment of the accounts of Samuel H. Moer, deceased, to allow credit for the disbursement of the public funds disbursed by him under the authority of William Gilpin, late governor of Colorado Territory, of the amount with which he now stands charged upon the books of the Treasury, upon satisfactory evidence being furnished of the actual disbursement of said fund for the benefit of the public service.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed, upon such settlement and adjustment being made as aforesaid, to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the heirs or legal representative of the said Samuel H. Moer the pay and allowances due him by reason of his services as captain and assistant quartermaster of volunteers during the late war, and withheld on account of non-settlement of his accounts.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the report be read.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. This man was selected for the disbursement of certain quartermasters' funds in the service of the Department and purchased certain property, using all the funds; but his vouchers, or one set of them, were rejected on account of some informality. He afterward and before the rectification of the informality died. The Government got possession of the property which had been accounted for, and the only mistake was in reference to the formality of the vouchers. This bill proposes simply to allow settlement with the heirs the same as if the vouchers had been corrected.

Mr. SPRINGER. About what amount is involved?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. The whole amount was $65,000. There is a deficiency of about $16,000 I think in the vouchers.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think we had better have the report read.

The report (by Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana) is as follows:

The facts as presented by the petition and the evidence are as follows: That in 1861 the legal authorities of the United States placed in the hands of Governor Gilpin, of Colorado, the sum of $65,198.67 to be expended for quartermaster stores, and for subsisting and equipping United States troops; that Samuel H. Moer, then a citizen of Denver, was selected by said governor as his agent for the disbursement of said funds; that in pursuance of said appointment, said Moer disbursed said funds, and forwarded vouchers therefor to the proper authorities; but vouchers covering the sum of $16,075 were found in some manner to be defective, and were returned for correction, but the evidence fails to show that the vouchers thus returned ever came to the possession of said Moer, as he was then in the military service of the United States. The evidence further shows that subsequently the Government detailed and authorized one Captain Alley to take charge of said store, and that said stores were actually in store when said Captain Alley took possession thereof, but that said Alley said there was no necessity for his receipting for the same, and he refused to do so.

There is no doubt but said money was properly expended by said Moer, and that the Government got the stores purchased therewith, and only has an account against said Moer in form and not in justice. It further appears that the Government still owes said Moer for services as a soldier rendered during the rebellion, and refuses to pay the same because said account is unsettled.

As the present bill authorizes and directs the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to allow a settlement of said account by allowing a credit for the amount covered by said imperfect vouchers, and authorizes the payment of any sum due said Moer for his services as a soldier, your committee think it is but just and right, and therefore recommend the passage of the same.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask if this bill requires that the Secretary of the Treasury shall adjust this account as he may determine, or does it require a settlement upon the basis of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the bill will be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was accordingly laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WASHINGTON L. PARVIN AND HENRY A. GREENE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5535) for the relief of Washington L. Parvin and Henry A. Greene.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to examine and determine the amounts justly due Washington L. Parvin for expenses incurred by him in recruiting, transporting, and subsisting Company F, First Regiment California Infantry Volunteers, in the year 1861, in the State of California; also what is justly due Henry A. Greene for expenses incurred by him in recruiting, transporting, and subsisting Company G, First Regiment California Infantry Volunteers, in the year 1861, in the State of California; but in no case shall the amount allowed thereon to the said Washington L. Parvin exceed $991.10, nor shall the amount allowed to the said Henry A. Greene exceed the sum of $3,303. And the sums so found to be due to said Washington L. Parvin and Henry A. Greene, respectively, shall be paid to them by a disbursing officer under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That acceptance of such payment shall be in full of all claims on account of said expenses: Provided further, That no claim under the provisions of this act shall be audited and paid unless presented within one year from the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. LYMAN) is as follows:

We copy and adopt as our own a report made by the Committee on War Claims of a former Congress on this same claim, viz:

The claim made by these applicants for relief, as provided in the bill referred to the committee, is for money which Captain Parvin and Captain Greene actually expended, the one in enlisting Company F, and the other Company G, of the First Regiment of California Volunteers in the year 1861, under the first call of President Lincoln for troops to defend the lawful authority of the Government.

At this time there was no step taken by the executive of the State of California to comply with the call. Under these circumstances Captains Parvin and Greene each raised a company of the First California Regiment, and each at his own expense enlisted, subsisted, and provided transportation for their respective companies until they were mustered into the service for three years, or the war, by order of General Sumner, some time in 1861.

The entire expense of enlisting, subsisting, and transporting these companies from the northern part of the State, a distance of about 200 miles, to San Francisco, was paid by these applicants up to the time when the companies were mustered into the service in the First California Regiment, under the command of Col. James H. Carleton. No part of these expenses was paid by the State of California, nor has any claim been made by that State on the General Government for any part thereof.

The evidence before the committee shows very clearly that in raising Company F Captain Parvin expended $1,932.50, of which he has received from the Government the amount by him expended, except for subsistence. Under the rule of the War Department he could be allowed only 40 cents per day for the ration of each soldier, while, as it appears by the evidence before the committee, the actual cost and the actual amount which he paid for each man exceeded $1.50 per day. His claim is for the balance, being about $1,000.

Upon the application of Captain Greene to the War Department for the money which he expended in raising, subsisting, and transporting his company he was informed that as he could obtain of the Department only an allowance of 40 cents a day for rations, and as his claim was for an actual expenditure of more than $1.50 per day for each man, it would be as well to seek relief from Congress for the whole as to receive from the Department a part, and still be obliged to seek relief from Congress for the balance.

The committee have carefully examined the affidavits and other papers which have been referred to them, and are entirely satisfied that Captain Parvin and Captain Greene has each expended the money for which they now seek to be reimbursed, and that except as stated, a part payment to Captain Parvin, no part of the money thus expended has been reimbursed either by the State of California or by the General Government.

The States in raising troops in defense of the Republic have been reimbursed all the expenses incurred in recruiting, subsisting, and transporting troops up to the time of being mustered into the service.

In raising these two companies of the First Regiment California Volunteers, the executive furnished neither place of rendezvous, subsistence, nor transportation. Captains Parvin and Greene made their advances until their companies were mustered into the service, and the committee can see no reason why as individuals they should not be placed upon an equal footing with States in this respect.

Although a long time has elapsed since these disbursements were made, it appears that the applicants since they left the service at the end of the war have been diligent in seeking the relief which they now ask.

A similar bill has once passed the Senate. That bill was considered and recommended by the Military Committee of the House, but failed for want of time to be presented for the approval of the House.

The committee therefore report and recommend the passage of the bill which was referred to them. This bill simply directs the proper accounting officer to examine and determine the amounts justly due to Washington L. Parvin, not exceeding $991.10, for expenses incurred by him in recruiting, subsisting, and transporting Company F, First Regiment Infantry, California Volunteers, in the year 1861, and also what is justly due Henry A. Greene, not exceeding $3,303, for expenses incurred by him for a like purpose with reference to Company G, of the same regiment.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PATRICK FLYNN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 331) for the relief of Patrick Flynn, reported adversely by the Committee on War Claims.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Patrick Flynn the pay and allowances of a major of infantry from March 10, 1863, to November 26, 1863, inclusive, deducting therefrom the pay he received during said period.

Mr. ROWELL. I see by the Calendar that this bill is reported adversely by the Committee on War Claims. I think that report was made under a misapprehension of the facts. The same bill was reported favorably by the same Committee on War Claims in the Forty-eighth Congress, and I think that but for a misapprehension it would have been reported favorably again.

Patrick Flynn was a captain of the Ninetieth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers. March the 1st, 1863, the lieutenant-colonelcy of that regiment became vacant, and the governor of Illinois, who was by law authorized to appoint the commissioned officers of the regiments of the State, commissioned Major Stewart as lieutenant-colonel and Captain Flynn as major of the regiment.

The colonel of the regiment was hostile to these officers. I know something of the regiment. It was an Irish regiment, and a very excellent one, but the colonel was one of those men who believed in fighting without discipline, and these officers were men who believed that discipline was necessary to make a good regiment.

These commissions were issued by the governor of the State of Illinois, and transmitted to the colonel on the 6th of April, and he refused to deliver them to these officers so that they might be mustered. He alleged as a reason that the regiment at that time was below the minimum, and therefore not entitled to a lieutenant-colonel or to a major; misapprehending the law which provided that where a regiment was below the minimum and the colonelcy became vacant there should be no promotion to that office. The colonel of the regiment wrote to the governor of the State, asserting his right to name the field officers and nominating others to the positions. The governor, asserting his own right and in the interests of the regiment, refused to commission the officers nominated by the colonel. He, therefore, refused to deliver these commissions, holding them in his possession, preventing these officers from being mustered to the positions to which they had been commissioned.

In September the colonel withdrew his opposition to the mustering of the major promoted to lieutenant-colonel, and he was mustered. In November the colonel finally withdrew his opposition to the muster of the major, Captain Flynn, and he was then mustered in as major of the regiment.

This bill proposes to pay him the difference between the pay of a captain and that of a major from the date of the reception of his commission till the date of his final muster; and it is based upon the principle that the governor of the State had the lawful right, as he had the duty, to commission these officers and to name who they should be; that the colonel of the regiment, by his unlawful and arbitrary act, prevented their going upon duty in these several offices; that the United States was entitled to have these offices filled; that the governor of the State did fill them; that these officers were prevented from being mustered by the arbitrary act of the colonel, and that therefore the United States ought to pay for this service.

The only reason why this muster can not be corrected under a general law is the fact that this man was prevented from discharging the duties of major under his commission by the act of his colonel.

I therefore move, Mr. Chairman, that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BRAGG. I trust that the report of the Committee on War Claims will be sustained by this House. If this officer is entitled to pay we have provided by general laws how he shall receive his pay and what proof shall be required in order to entitle him to his pay.

The proof required under the law as it now stands is, first, that he shall have had a commission; second, that there shall have been a vacancy in the office to which he has been commissioned; third, that he shall have discharged the duties of the office. Then he will be entitled to his pay whether he was mustered or not.

The case as presented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] contains two of the elements necessary for the officer to receive pay; but it fails to contain the third and vital element upon which all pay is based; that is that the man discharged the duty for which you propose to pay him. By the statement of the advocate of the bill against the report it is conceded that this officer did not discharge the duty. Why, then, shall he be paid for doing a duty which it is conceded he did not do? If he did not do the duty he ought not to have his pay, and the majority report is manifestly correct. It is no answer to that to say that somebody else prevented him from doing the duty. We are not here to wash the dirty linen that grew up in the quarrels between the officers of an Illinois regiment or any other regiment. That is a matter for them to settle with themselves. With us the simple question is whether the man was entitled to pay by reason of duty performed and under circumstances where the law recognized its performance as entitling him to pay; which is an element absent in this case.

Mr. LYMAN. I desire to say but a word on the matter before the committee. This bill was under my charge as a subcommittee of the Committee on War Claims, and the report was made by myself by the direction of that committee.

The facts as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] are substantially correct, as I understand them. There was a quarrel in the regiment between the colonel and other officers of the regiment. The commissions were issued to this officer, Captain Flynn, as major, and to another officer, Major Stewart, as lieutenant-colonel. The colonel of the regiment withheld these commissions for some time—indeed, until about the time of his death.

Now the record shows that this regiment was not up to the maximum; that it was indeed much below the minimum at the time these commissions were issued. And here I must take issue with the gentleman from Illinois as to what the law was on that subject. He states that at that time when a regiment was below the minimum a vacancy in the colonelcy could not be filled. The understanding I have of that law is that when there was a vacancy in any of the three field offices, colonel, lieutenant-colonel, or major, and the regiment was below the minimum, that vacancy could not be filled; that a regiment below the minimum was not entitled to more than two field officers.

The same was true, as I understand the law, of a company; if it was below the minimum it was entitled to only two field officers, and a vacancy would not be filled. That is the understanding that I have always had of that law, and that was the understanding generally throughout the portion of the army in which I served. Personally, I would be glad if the law were different, for I myself carried a commission for a higher grade for a long time because my regiment was below the minimum, and I could not be mustered. The colonel was alive, and the lieutenant-colonel was in the service. Now, the view which the committee took of the present case was this: The record shows that this regiment was below the minimum, and that it was not entitled to three field officers, and I think it shows affirmatively that this man did not perform the duties of major—at all events, it fails to show that he did perform them. He was carried on the rolls as a captain, and was in command of his company until the date of his muster, the date when he began to draw pay as a major, and if we have not misapprehended the law entirely, we can not pass this bill without opening the door to hundreds, I might say thousands, of claims of like character. Those who were in the service well know that there were many officers who were promoted and received their commissions and carried them, but could not be mustered because their regiments were below the minimum.

We have an act providing that in cases where an officer entered upon the duties of an office and actually performed those duties, he can be paid by the Department. There is no difficulty about a case of that kind. But this is not that case. So far as the record shows, this officer, Captain Flynn, never performed the duties of a major until the date of his muster. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] says that the colonel finally withdrew his objection to the muster of Captain Flynn, who was then mustered.

I do not so understand the record, as presented before the Committee on War Claims. That record shows that Captain Flynn was mustered after the colonel of the regiment had been killed in battle, and that he was mustered at a time when (the colonel having been killed) the regiment was entitled to two field-officers, the lieutenant-colonel and the major. I do not know whether the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] means to say that the record shows that this officer was mustered by reason of the withdrawal of the objection of the colonel, though I understand him to say that that was the fact. But however that fact may be, it would have nothing to do with the case, as I understand it, and it does not appear in the record. The record shows that he was mustered when the colonel had been killed.

Mr. ROWELL. It is true, Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LYMAN] states, that this man was not mustered until after the colonel was killed, but it is also true that before the battle in which the colonel was killed he had withdrawn his objection, and had delivered the commission. Almost immediately after that they went into battle, and the colonel was killed. The gentleman misapprehends the law as it was misapprehended in the Western army for a short time. The law provided that general orders should be issued regulating the number of officers when a regiment came below the minimum, and those orders provided that if the colonelcy became vacant there should be no promotion to colonel; or, if the second lieutenantcy in a company became vacant there should be no promotion to the second lieutenantcy. This colonel, after being informed of his misapprehension of the law, as appears by the record before the War Claims Committee, sent to the governor of Illinois nominations different from Captain Stewart and Captain Flynn to fill the two positions of lieutenant-colonel and major.

The governor of Illinois asserted his own right in the interest of good discipline to determine who should fill those two offices, and declined to comply with the request of the colonel. This man, Captain Flynn, failed to discharge the duties of major, not through any fault on his part, because he was present with the regiment and ready to perform those duties, not for lack of a commission issued by lawful authority, because a commission had been issued to him by the governor of Illinois and placed in the hands of the colonel, but because of the arbitrary act of the colonel of his regiment in refusing to deliver that commission to him in order that he might be mustered. The Government of the United States was in duty bound to pay the salary of a lieutenant-colonel and of a major of that regiment, when, by the act of one of its own officers, the lieutenant-colonel and the major failed to obtain their commissions, so that they might be mustered.

It is an old plea in opposition to a just bill that other claims may come in; yet, in the Forty-eighth Congress, we passed a law authorizing the remuster of all officers who had been commissioned, but had failed to be mustered on their commissions, provided that they went upon duty, and that the regiment was entitled to such officers. An officer who was commissioned for a regiment in which there was no vacancy, or a regiment which, under the law, was not entitled to such an officer, could not by law be remustered. The only trouble in regard to the remuster in this case is that the man was prevented from entering upon the performance of his duty; not that there was no vacancy to which he might be promoted. The single fact that his commission was not delivered, and for that reason he was not permitted to enter upon the discharge of his duties, makes the passage of this bill necessary in order that this man may not be deprived of the rights granted to him under the commission of the governor of Illinois. It seems to me justice demands the passage of this bill.

This man is not a constituent of mine; and I do not know him personally. I knew the regiment, its service, and the necessity for these officers, because I served near that regiment. I look upon this case as one in which remedial action should be adopted by Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The question being taken, the motion was not agreed to, there being ayes 36, noes 50.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the bill be reported to the House with a recommendation that it lie on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. In view of the vote just taken by the House, if there be no objection, the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] will be considered as agreed to. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; when a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 1877) for the relief of John McNaughton.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 309) to settle and adjust the claims of any State for expenses incurred by it in defense of the United States;

A bill (S. 474) for the relief of George W. Saulpaw;

A bill (S. 1359) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin; and

A bill (S. 1651) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make final adjustment of the claims of certain foreign steamship companies, arising from the illegal exaction of tonnage dues.

The Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar resumed its session.

SUFFERERS BY WRECK OF STEAMSHIP ASHUELOT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2110) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamship Ashuelot.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This bill has been reported by the House committee with amendments. The bill (S. 250) on page 63 of the Calendar, is in precisely the same form as the House bill with the amendments of the committee. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 250) be taken up instead of the bill (H. R. 2110) and substituted therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] asks unanimous consent that the bill he has indicated be taken up in lieu of the one the title of which has just been read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill (S. 250) was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That to reimburse the officers of the United States Steamer Ashuelot, wrecked off the Lamock Islands, in the China Sea, on the night of the 18th of February, 1883, for the loss incurred by them, respectively, in said wreck, there shall be paid, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the following sums, namely: To Andrew J. Iverson, lieutenant; Ambrose B. Wyckoff, lieutenant; Henry T. Stockton, lieutenant; Frank R. Hotchkin, lieutenant, junior grade; T. E. D. W. Veeder, lieutenant, junior grade; Edward N. Whitehouse, paymaster; Samuel H. Dickson, passed assistant surgeon; and James M. Pickrell, assistant engineer, each $1,000. To Silas H. Wright, naval cadet; Samuel H. Williamson, naval cadet; William T. Webster, naval cadet; Robert Stewart, naval cadet; A. F. Callander, mate; and David Monat, pay clerk, each $700.

SEC. 2. That the widow, child, or children, or in case there be not such, then the surviving parent or parents of those in the service who were lost in the wreck of the United States steamer Ashuelot, namely: William Gronan, seaman; George Valentine, captain of the hold; Fritz Rackenbach, quartermaster; William Bronson, landsman; Saint Leger Crone, quarter-gunner; Ah Kid, painter; Sun Shing, carpenter's mate; George Ashton, carpenter; Ah Too, landsman; Andrew Scotland, private marine; and Benjamin H. Wohlrab, landsman, shall be entitled to and receive, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, as follows, to wit: The relatives, in the order named, of the persons connected with the United States steamer Ashuelot, hereinbefore referred to, a sum equal to twelve months' sea-pay of each person lost: Provided, That in any case where heretofore a pension has been granted, or may hereafter in fact be granted, to any such widow, child, or dependent parent, by reason of the death of any of the persons named in this section, in the payment of such pension account shall be taken of any sum paid as above provided, and to the extent of its account said sum shall be in lieu and stead of such pension, and no further: Provided further, That the legal representatives of the above deceased persons who were in the service of the Government shall also be paid from the Treasury of the United States any arrears of pay due said deceased at the time of their death.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after the word "surgeon," in line 14, the names of "James Entwistle and Robert R. Leach, passed assistant engineers."

Mr. MARTIN. It seems that the name of James Entwistle was stricken out of this bill upon the supposition that he had been guilty of gross neglect of duty. From all the information that I can gather, there is a misapprehension existing on this subject. It appears that after he had cleared the vessel and had left it, and had so reported, one man went back to the vessel for the purpose of getting something, and in doing so lost his life. This is the only neglect of duty that could by any means be attributed to Entwistle; and I think that, under the circumstances, there is no more reason why his name should be stricken out than there is for striking out the name of any other person mentioned in the bill. I hope, therefore, that my amendment will be adopted, and the language of the bill restored as it was originally.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be adopted, and for reasons which I will briefly state. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MARTIN] is in error in saying that these names were stricken out of the bill. They were not in the bill as introduced in the present Congress. They were in the bill which was introduced in the Forty-eighth Congress; and upon that bill a report was made, favorable in its character, except as to these two engineers. That report, drawn up by the honorable member from Virginia [Mr. WISE], a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I hold in my hand; and from it I gather that at the time of this collision there was neglect of duty, in consequence of which a court-martial was convened, before which these engineers were tried. They were found guilty of neglect of duty, and suffered the sentence of that court-martial.

It may be the sentence pronounced by the court-martial should be taken by the country as expiation of the faults of these two men. The bill as it came before the Committee on Claims in the present House did not contain their names, and we were not under the necessity of passing on their cases. So far as this bill is concerned, these names now appear for the first time, and the question for this House to consider is whether the other worthy claimants shall have their bill endangered in its passage through Congress this session for the benefit of these two gentlemen who were found by court-martial guilty of neglect of duty at such a critical period, and who suffered the sentence pronounced against them in punishment of that neglect.

I do not know whether the sentence thus pronounced against these officers was too severe or not, but I do know the sentence of one was that he should be reprimanded by the honorable Secretary of the Navy, and that the other officer be suspended from duty for one year on leave-of-absence pay and maintain his present grade during that period. Now, it might be that on reinvestigation of the matter, so far as these officers are concerned, that I would not object to the introduction of their names into this bill, if it were not for the fact that at present the introduction of their names into the pending measure must seriously endanger its passage. And it seems to me that justice to these worthy claimants should not be now postponed longer for the convenience of those whom a court-martial found guilty of neglect of duty.

Mr. LONG. Let me inquire of the gentleman from New Jersey whether the loss of the Ashuelot was found to be due to their carelessness.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am asked by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts whether the loss of the Ashuelot was found to be due to the negligence of these officers, and I will say, from information, that while the actual loss of the vessel was not due to the negligence of these officers, that the loss of life was.

Mr. MARTIN. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the information of the gentleman from New Jersey either is incorrect or that I am myself in error. From what I gather in regard to this case it appears these parties were tried by a court-martial; and while they were exonorated from all blame, they were nevertheless, by the censure inflicted upon them, subjected to a certain punishment or penalty which each one of these parties has undergone. I think the gentleman understands full well that whatever the sentence of that court-martial was in each instance it has been fully executed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And I so stated in my remarks.

Mr. MARTIN. Both were punished to the extent which the court-martial thought they ought to have been punished.

What are the facts in reference to the case to this man Entwistle? He reported everything was clear in his department, and everything was at that time. The loss of life which resulted afterward was due to the circumstance that a man went back into that department under the charge of Entwistle for the purpose of bringing something out, and while attempting to do so lost his life. If the matter could be reinvestigated, I am told, it would appear fully and completely that this man is in no respect responsible for the loss of life which occurred on that occasion. It was a misfortune.

But even if it were so, if there were a degree of carelessness, if even that were attributed to him, he has undergone the sentence of the court-martial and should not be asked to suffer any further.

Why should these men, then, be prevented from sharing the bounty, or whatever it may be called, which the Government proposes to give to those who suffered by reason of this disaster. I have myself no interest in the matter. I offered an amendment in the interest of a gentleman who seems to be acquainted with everything connected with the matter, who knows this party and declares him to be a most deserving man, and who believes that, having suffered the full penalty of the sentence of the court-martial, there should be an end to it and that he should be allowed to be provided for with the others in this bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If there is a case where the doctrine of laches should apply it is the present one. It was presented to Congress in January, 1886, and referred to the Committee on Claims and promptly acted on by that committee, the report being submitted to the House on the 2d of March, 1886. No one appeared in that committee in behalf of these gentlemen to have their names placed in it, and there has been no such effort to place their names in it except within the last half hour, when a gentleman appeared on this floor and asked to have their names inserted.

Now, why should these worthy claimants have justice to them longer postponed by having their bill endangered and jeopardized by the insertion of the names of these two officers, however they may have suffered and however unjustly they may have been condemned, when those officers failed to put in an appearance before the committee so their names might be placed in the bill? In my judgment, now to place them in the bill would practically defeat the passage of the bill.

As to allegations in reference to their conduct, I do not go back of the findings of the court-martial. I take the facts as I find them there, and they are as I have stated them. The Committee on Naval Affairs of the last House in their report used this language:

As to the engineers, your committee are of the opinion they ought also to be excluded from the provisions of the bill because of neglect of duty at a time of great peril, when it was incumbent upon them to be more than ordinarily brave, prompt, active, and vigilant. Your committee think it would furnish a bad precedent to remunerate them for their loss.

I do not know these gentlemen; I know nothing about them. I only know that at this, the eleventh hour, ay, at half past the eleventh hour, they come in here and ask that these others be postponed unless they can be considered. I hope, Mr. Chairman, they will be remanded to their own separate bill for their own relief, in order that the judgment of the House may deal with each case as it is presented and as it deems best.

With reference to the particular facts of the case, whether they have been punished sufficiently or not, it is impossible for us to determine, because, as I said before, their names did not appear in the original bill, and hence the committee had no occasion to investigate that subject. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask a vote on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 16, noes 36.

Mr. MARTIN. No quorum has voted.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House having had under consideration business on the Private Calendar had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

MOBILE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the first business coming over from a previous session of the committee.

The Clerk read, as follows:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 72) to provide for the settlement of accounts with the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be indulged in a very brief explanation or statement of the facts on which this joint resolution is founded, and I think if gentlemen will give me their attention they will have no difficulty in determining how to cast their votes upon it.

At the close of the late civil war, in 1865 or 1866, nearly all of the railroads in the Southern States were in a bankrupt condition and had no rolling-stock and no money with which to buy it. The Government owned all of the rolling-stock throughout the country and sold it to the different railroads on time, taking bonds from them bearing 6 per cent. interest for the payment. In 1875, on February 23 of that year, Congress passed an act organizing a board consisting of the Attorney-General and the Secretary of War, and vested them with power and authority to adjust the claims of the Government and the counter claims of these various railroads, and gave them authority to allow deductions from the price at which they had purchased the rolling-stock not to exceed 25 per cent. within their discretion.

Applying that rule to this particular company, the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, they found that the payments made by the company, added to the amount due for services rendered the Government, would exceed the amount of its liability, which, when it was carried out, amounted to $505,000 or $555,000, I forget exactly which.

Under that law they had not the power or authority to draw on the Treasury for the surplus found due in favor of the company, and hence failed to adjust this claim. This bill proposes therefore simply an extension of that act which will invest the Attorney-General and the Secretary of War with the power and authority to audit, adjust, and settle the accounts between this company and the Government of the United States, and it allows them to exercise all the discretion which was vested in the same officers under the original act; that is, to allow to this company a deduction to the extent of 25 per cent., or any less sum; or if in their judgment they ought not in equity to have any deduction then it is within their power to withhold it. It simply invests them with a sound discretion, which they will exercise, and arrive no doubt at a just conclusion.

If any deduction is proper it will be allowed. After casting up the accounts in favor of the company for money paid and services rendered the Government and the $505,000 which the company are to pay for the rolling-stock and the interest, being therefore simply a matter of the settlement of the accounts, the auditing and adjusting and settling of the claim.

It seems to me there is no possibility of danger here, and that it is not only a matter of right, but a simple matter of justice. I move the previous question upon the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered; under the operation of which the resolution was passed.

Mr. OATES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL SAWYER.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. 4028) granting a pension to Samuel Sawyer, the question being upon the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

DANIEL SCHULTHEIS.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation was the bill (H. R. 7911) granting a pension to Daniel Schultheis, the question being on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask how these bills come before the House.

The SPEAKER. They come over as unfinished reports from the Committee of the Whole on a previous session, and are taken up in their order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Were these not bills that were objected to at night sessions when the question of a quorum was raised, and they were sent to a full House to be acted upon?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would make no difference. They come over as unfinished reports from the committee, and are first in order when that class of business is taken up.

The bill was passed.

FRIDOLINE GLASTETTER.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation was the bill (S. 2132) granting a pension to Fridoline Glastetter.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and having been read the third time, was passed.

JOHN R. HARRINGTON.

The bill (H. R. 4594) for the relief of John R. Harrington was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM PIKE.

The bill (H. R. 527) for the relief of William Pike was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE W. BALDWIN ET AL.

The bill (H. R. 529) for the relief of George W. Baldwin, Charles L. Baldwin, and Dora Thompson was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. HIGGINS.

The bill (H. R. 940) for the relief of John M. Higgins was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with an adverse recommendation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Upon that question I demand a vote.

The question being taken,

The SPEAKER stated that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 9.

So (further count not being called for) the bill was laid upon the table.

ELON A. MARSH ET AL.

The bill (H. R. 5894) for the relief of Elon A. Marsh and Minard Lafever was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF SAMUEL H. MOER.

The bill (H. R. 3365) for the relief of the heirs or legal representative of Samuel H. Moer was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON L. PARVIN ET AL.

The bill (H. R. 5535) for the relief of Washington L. Parvin and Henry A. Greene was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WRECK OF THE UNITED STATES STEAMER ASHUELOT.

The bill (H. R. 2110) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Ashuelot was reported by the Committee of the Whole House with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

The bill (H. R. 2110) was laid upon the table.

PATRICK FLYNN.

The bill (H. R. 331) for the relief of Patrick Flynn was reported by the Committee of the Whole House with an adverse recommendation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the committee did not direct this bill to be reported to the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole announced that the committee having refused to report back the bill with a favorable recommendation, that was equivalent to directing it to be reported back with an adverse recommendation.

The SPEAKER. The committee must expressly direct the bill to be reported. The refusal to report a bill with an adverse or a favorable recommendation does not take the bill out of the committee.

Mr. BRAGG. A motion was made to report the bill back adversely with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table, whereupon the chairman of the Committee of the Whole stated what the effect of the former vote would be, that it was the same as directing the bill to be reported with the recommendation that it be laid on the table; that legitimately construed, that action had the same effect as giving unanimous consent to the bill being reported.

The SPEAKER. If an arrangement of that sort is made and acquiesced in, it would bring the bill before the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. A statement to that effect was made at the time, and no objection was made to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] that the bill be reported adversely.

The bill was laid upon the table.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the several votes by which bills had been passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is one hour of time before the House will take a recess. I ask unanimous consent that a bill reported from the Committee on Claims looking to the adjudication of all private claims against the Government by the Court of Claims shall have consideration at this time; the object being to get the matter into the hands of a conference committee so that the whole subject of private claims and the disposition of them may be determined at this session of Congress. The Senate has passed a bill amending what is called the Bowman act. The Committee on Claims has had it under consideration and recommends striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu of it the bill reported by the House Committee on Claims on that subject.

The House is not asked to determine any question on this subject, but to put this whole matter in a shape that we can have a conference committee. And I will state for the information of the House that it is desired to consider at the same time the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, so that the whole subject may be embraced in one act and come before us for action at this session. If the House will adopt this motion I will give the assurance that, the Chair assenting, the committee of conference will embrace the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, so that we may cover all the matters involved.

Mr. BRAGG. I hope the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois will not be acceded to by the House. I remember we had a long and severe struggle over the passage of what is called the Holman act——

Several MEMBERS. Bowman act.

Mr. BRAGG. It was Holman and Bowman, and everybody else that was connected with it. The question involved is such a one as I think ought to receive the careful consideration of the House.

The questions involved in the bill should be discussed in the House. This very clever offer to go out in conference with three or four gentlemen and fix up some legislation and bring it in here to be adopted by the House in the form of a conference report I think ought not to be accepted upon an important measure like this, intended to deal with the disposition of all claims against the Government of the United States. I have great confidence in the wisdom of conference committees, but I also have great distrust at times of their action, and I hope the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois will prevail.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let me say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] that this subject has received consideration not only at this session but at every session of Congress since I have been here, and that the Judiciary Committee has at this session reported a very thorough bill upon the subject. The Committee on Claims has also prepared a bill, and those two measures, together with the action of the Senate, would cover the whole subject of private claims in Congress. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that when we have just frittered away another day upon such claims and have accomplished scarcely anything, the representatives of the people ought to be willing to consider whether or no this matter of adjudicating private claims should not be provided for in another way, namely, by taking them out of Congress and placing them where they should be, in the hands of a court.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now take a recess.

The SPEAKER. A single objection prevents the consideration of the bill this afternoon. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] moves that the House now take a recess until half past 7 o'clock.

ELIZABETH S. DE KRAFFT.

Mr. STRUBLE, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Pensions a bill (S. 2730) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth S. de Krafft; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ST. DOMINICK'S CHURCH, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. STORM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10414) for the relief of St. Dominick's church, in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1829) for the relief of the Greensburg Limestone Company, and others;

A bill (S. 1353) referring to the Court of Claims for adjudication the claims of John H. Kinkead, Samuel Sussman, and Charles O. Wood; and

A bill (S. 2901) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey the United States custom-house and post-office property at Eastport, in the State of Maine, lately destroyed by fire; the proceeds thereof to be invested in the purchase of a new site for, and to provide for the erection of, a new public building at that place.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. BRAGG for a recess, and the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

A division being called for, the House divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 14.

The SPEAKER. The motion for a recess is agreed to. At the evening session the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] will preside.

The House accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) took a recess until 7.30 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 7.30 p. m., Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order under which this evening session is held.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p.m., at which evening sessions private bills granting pensions reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only, be considered.

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the order for this evening.

Mr. DOCKERY. Before that motion is put, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent (if it is proper to ask it in the House) that members present may be allowed to call up such bills as they desire.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be a matter to be determined in Committee of the Whole.

The motion of Mr. SWOPE was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. TOWNSHEND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the pending bill.

CHARLES E. CAPEHART.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1481) granting an increase of pension to Col. Charles E. Capehart.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles E. Capehart, late lieutenant-colonel, First Regiment of Virginia Cavalry, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he now receives.

An amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions was read, as follows:

In the seventh line of the printed bill strike out "fifty" and insert "forty-five," making the provision read "at the rate of $45 per month."

The CHAIRMAN. Upon this amendment the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUTTIT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I ask that the report be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that the report has already been read.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest that the gentleman from California state the substance of the report.

Mr. LOUTTIT. I can state the substance of it if desired.

Mr. Chairman, the objection, I understand, is withdrawn; and the question now recurs on the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I am making no objection. I merely wanted to know what reason there was why we should vote to increase this pension.

Mr. LONG. This amendment is to cut it down.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I do not want to do injustice by decreasing any pension without sufficient reason, and therefore I desire the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUTTIT] desires to have the report read or to make some explanation, the gentleman from Mississippi will be recognized and can himself call for the reading of the report.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I do not want to interrupt these proceedings, but I would like to know what there is in this case.

Mr. LONG. We might pass the bill first, and the gentleman can read the report afterward. [Laughter.]

The amendment of Mr. LOUTTIT was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DOCKERY. I now renew my request that the regular order be dispensed with and that members be recognized for the purpose of calling up from the Calendar such bills as they may designate.

Mr. BRADY. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order will be the reading of the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. BRADY. Upon the solicitation of several gentlemen I withdraw the call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] will be adopted.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

LIFURS ROBERSON.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I call up the bill (H. R. 3167) to restore the name of Lifurs Roberson to the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to restore the name of Lifurs Roberson, late of the First North Carolina Regiment, Mexican war, to the pension-roll.

The amendment reported by the committee, to strike out, in lines 4 and 5, the words "the First North Carolina Regiment," and insert "Company K, Fifth Tennessee Volunteers in the," was read and adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES H. YOUNG.

Mr. LONG. I call up the bill (H. R. 8424) granting a pension to James H. Young.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James H. Young, late of Company I, Sixth Regiment Kansas Cavalry Volunteers.

Mr. LONG. I ask that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was read, as follows:

James H. Young enlisted October 7, 1861, and was mustered out August 19, 1865. Originally mustered as private, he passed through the several grades, and when mustered out was captain of Company C, Fifteenth Kansas Cavalry. He made a declaration for pension February 13, 1886, alleging "rupture, injury to right thigh, and hemorrhoids." Claim was rejected April 20, the same year, on the ground that there was no record of alleged rupture, injury to right thigh, and piles, and claimant's inability to furnish any testimony as to their incurrence in service and line of duty.

The evidence and papers in the case show Captain Young to have been a brave and efficient officer, and that he did contract disabilities in the service. By hard riding and saddle service he contracted piles, Dr. T. B. Lester, of Kansas City, Mo., operating upon him surgically twice for the same, but producing only temporary relief, not a cure; also, during the Price raid, when between Forts Smith and Gibson, in November, 1864, his horse fell, catching him under the saddle, causing rupture and injury to hip, so much so that for the rupture he has been obliged to wear a truss and bandage ever since.

Robert R. Roberts, M. D., testifies to treatment in New Orleans, 1875, where he—

"Treated claimant for partial paralysis and rheumatism of right hip and leg, the seat of the diseases being located in the lumbar and coccygeal regions of the spine, being result of injuries received while in service of the United States; also treated him for right inguinal hernia of right abdominal region, he then being unable to walk without crutches; have known him ever since, and to my certain knowledge he has not been able, and is not now able, to perform physical labor."

The board of surgeons at Washington, D. C., who examined claimant rate him at total for hernia and one-fourth total for piles.

It seems to be established that claimant was free from all disease when he enlisted; that he performed hard and exhaustive service in the saddle in Kansas and Missouri; that he contracted the disabilities as alleged, from which he has suffered ever since. He is now sixty-three years of age, infirm and poor, with the burden of disabilities increasing year by year; but, like many another gallant soldier, he has delayed asking the Government for what he had justly earned, so long as he could do for himself and get along without its help, until now, compelled by increasing age and infirmity to ask for aid, he finds that those to whom he must look for that strict evidence required by the Department are dead or scattered, whither he knows not.

Your committee, therefore, in view of all the facts, think this claimant has richly earned and should receive the assistance asked for, and therefore report back the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

LINNÆUS W. RISLEY.

Mr. NEAL. I call up the bill (H. R. 8670) granting a pension to Linnæus W. Risley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Linnæus W. Risley, late of Company D, Eighteenth Indiana Volunteers.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

Claimant enlisted June 14, 1861, and was discharged January 21, 1863.

Claimant alleges that August 19, 1862, he fell from the third story of hospital No. 1, at New Albany, Ind., where he had been confined sick. Said fall caused concussion, which resulted in vertigo and insanity. Also, while drilling State militia at Lawrenceburg, Ind., August 28, 1862, he accidentally discharged a shotgun which he had in his hand, wounding himself in left foot. He was acting under orders of Colonel Spooner.

Claim was rejected on the ground that said wound was not received in line of duty, and of no record in the War Department of alleged injury resulting in vertigo, and his inability to furnish satisfactory testimony showing origin of said injury in the service and line of duty.

The records of the War Department do not show cause of detail.

Certificate of disability shows him wounded in right foot while handling a shotgun.

Surgeon Carpenter, of the United States medical director's office, Cincinnati, Ohio, who signed the certificate of disability, states in said certificate that claimant did not receive said wound in line of duty. Upon what grounds he based this statement is not shown. It is fair to presume that it was not from personal knowledge, as he was a hospital surgeon at Cincinnati, Ohio, when claimant was brought to him.

Martha M. Soper testifies that claimant shot himself in left foot while under an attack of hallucination, and she and Dr. Harding took claimant to hospital in Cincinnati, Ohio.

Dr. Harding testifies that he treated claimant for vertigo in January, 1863, when claimant told him it was caused by a fall from a window of a hospital at New Albany, Ind.

The report of the Surgeon-General United States Army, shows him sick in hospital No. 1, New Albany, Ind., from August 18, 1862, to September 4, 1862.

Captain Hutchinson, late of Company D, Eighteenth Indiana Volunteers, in his affidavit of claimant's disability, says that claimant fell from the third story of hospital No. 1, at New Albany, Ind., the concussion of the fall causing insanity which affected him until he was discharged. He further states that claimant was a brave soldier and often led the skirmish, and that said fall was the cause of his affliction. Claimant states he was ordered to drill the State militia when he was wounded. If he was he ought to be considered in line of duty. He was not with his company any more after he was sent to the hospital at New Albany, Ind.

There is nothing adverse to the merit of the claim except the statement of Surgeon Carpenter, and he locates the wound as being on right foot, while the hospital record testimony and medical examinations show that it was the left foot. There may be a doubt as whether the wound was received in line of duty, but taking into consideration the circumstances of the case, your committee are of the opinion that the doubt should be given in favor of claimant, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

LIZZIE BROWN.

Mr. DINGLEY. I call up the bill (H. R. 7716) granting a pension to Lizzie Brown.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the pension laws, the name of Lizzie Brown, the dependent and crippled sister of Webster Brown, late of Company L, First Maine Heavy Artillery, who was killed in the battle of the Wilderness.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, were read, as follows:

Strike out, in lines 4 and 5, the words "subject to the pension laws."

At the end of the bill add the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

Mr. DINGLEY. The report in this case is very brief; let it be read.

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) was read, as follows:

Lizzie Brown filed a claim as dependent sister of Webster Brown, a private in Company L, First Maine Heavy Artillery, who was killed at the battle of the Wilderness. Claim was rejected on the ground that she had attained the age of sixteen years prior to the death of soldier. On account of this absolute bar the question of dependence and contributions was not gone into.

From the affidavits hereto appended it appears that this claimant is now and has been for the greater part of her life a hopeless invalid and cripple; that for twelve years she did not sit up or stand upon her feet; that both of her parents are dead, and she is dependent on charity. Her only brother, who had contributed to the support of his unfortunate sister, was killed in battle. These are the simple facts, and they constitute a strong and equitable claim.

The committee accordingly recommend that the bill be amended so as to fix her pension at $12 per month, and that as so amended it do pass.

STATE OF MAINE, county of Lincoln, ss:

In case of Lizzie Brown's petition for pension we, the undersigned, D. W. Hiscock, aged fifty-seven years, and J. Allen Jewett, aged forty-five years, both of the town of Alna, and both selectmen of said town of Alna, in the county of Lincoln and State of Maine, having been duly sworn, depose and say upon our oaths that we well knew Luther Brown, of this town; that he was the father of the said Lizzie Brown; that he died in this town March 16, 1876; that he had but one son, Webster Brown, who was killed in battle of the Wilderness, in Virginia; that the said Lizzie Brown was born April, 1848, and that for many years she has been wholly unable to earn her living, and has been, much of the time, for fifteen years confined to her bed in consequence of sickness, resulting in leaving her in a crippled condition; that she has no property to our knowledge to the amount of $100; that she has been, since the death of her said brother, Webster Brown, and her father, dependent upon the charity of her friends, with no prospect of her ever being restored to health or being able to earn her own living, and that unless the Government should give her a pension she must suffer.

We have no interest in the prosecution of this claim for pension.

D. W. HISCOCK.
J. ALLEN JEWETT.

Personally appeared the above-named D. W. Hiscock and J. Allen Jewett, whom I certify to be reliable men, and selectmen of said Alna, and made oath to the foregoing statement this 28th day of April, A. D, 1886.

EDWARD WEEKS,
Justice of the Peace.

STATE OF MAINE, county of Lincoln, ss:

Personally appeared before me, this 1st day of June, A. D. 1886, Addison Carney, aged fifty-five years, and Hellen Carney, aged forty-six years, both of New Castle, in said county and State, who, having been sworn according to law, do depose and say they have been well acquainted with Lizzie Brown, of Alna, in said county and State, for the past twenty-five years, and well knew her brother, Webster Brown, who was killed in battle while in the service of the United States; that to our personal knowledge the said Webster Brown did supply his said sister with funds for her support during his lifetime, he being her only brother, not having any property of her own, and being an invalid for life, and that this supply of funds was for years prior to his death. We also depose and say we have no interest in the claim of the said Lizzie Brown for pension. In witness of the foregoing statement we hereunto set our hands and seals.

ADDISON CARNEY. [SEAL.]
HELLEN CARNEY. [SEAL.]

JUNE 1, 1886.

STATE OF MAINE, county of Lincoln, ss:

Then personally appeared the above-named Addison Carney and Hellen Carney and made oath to the above statement, and I certify that the said witnesses are credible and entitled to belief. I have no interest in the claim of Lizzie Brown for pension.

[SEAL.]

F. IRVING CARNEY,
Notary Public.

BATH, ME., November 29, 1885.

SIR: In March or April, 1884, I made application for a pension for Miss Lizzie Brown, on account of her only brother, Webster Brown. She was a cripple at the time of his enlistment, and for twelve years she did not sit up or stand upon her feet. By the skillful treatment of a doctor from New York she got so she could walk around, but not able to do any work. Webster Brown enlisted December, 1863, in Company L, First Maine Heavy Artillery, in the war of the rebellion. He was killed in the battle of the Wilderness, May, 1864. Her father and mother are both dead, and Webster was her dependence, and she is an invalid, and under medical treatment now. She is not able to do any work. * * *

Yours respectfully,

JOSEPH BROWN.

Hon. NELSON DINGLEY, Jr.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN SELBY.

Mr. WILLIS. I call up the bill (H. R. 6026) granting a pension to John Selby.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Selby, dependent father of George Selby, late a private in Company C, Seventy-third Ohio Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

Soldier George Selby enlisted January 11, 1862, as private Company C, Seventy-third Ohio Volunteers, and was killed in battle of Bull Run, August 30, 1862.

Claimant John Selby claims pension as the dependent father of said George Selby; soldier left no wife, mother, or child surviving him.

Claim was rejected on the ground that claimant was able and did earn adequate means of support for himself and family at time of soldier's death.

Dr. Woddle states that claimant was not able to work for some time previous, and since 1862. For the last four years has treated claimant for disease of bladder and prostate gland. General health feeble; claimant is old and infirm, not able to support himself and family.

Jo. Hicks and James Vail testify that they have known claimant from 1862 to the present time, and that he has not been able to work half his time.

The auditor of Ross County, Ohio, says claimant's property, real and personal, was $750 in 1862.

Dr. Woddle says he bought claimant's house in 1867 for $900, which was heavily mortgaged. Knew claimant from 1860 to 1868, and that claimant depended on his own and son's labor for support.

Charles Russell states that claimant's only means of support was his own and son's earnings.

The board of United States examining surgeons of Louisville, Ky., says that claimant is wholly unable to do any kind of work.

It is the opinion of your committee that the claim is meritorious, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. HENRIETTA M. DRUM HUNT.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I call up the bill (H. R. 8869) granting a pension to Mrs. Henrietta M. Drum Hunt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henrietta M. Drum Hunt, widow of the late Lieut. Henry J. Hunt, United States Navy, and pay her a pension of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions was read, as follows:

In line 8, strike out "50," and insert "40;" so as to make the pension $40 per month.

The report (by Mr. SCOTT) was read, as follows:

The committee recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment:

In line 8, after the word "of," strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "forty."

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, this bill is verbatim the same as the one which has already passed the Senate. I am not certain whether that bill is on the Calendar, but if I can find it there I shall ask unanimous consent that it be substituted for this bill. I ask for the reading of the Senate report, which states fully the facts in the case.

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions (by Mr. BLAIR) was read, as follows:

The claimant, Henrietta M. Drum Hunt, is the widow of Henry J. Hunt, late a lieutenant in the United States Navy, who died at Washington, D. C., May 5, 1886. The widow filed her application before the Department May 13, 1886, basing the title to pension upon the death of Lieutenant Hunt from disease contracted in the line of duty while serving on board the steamer Alert, in the Greely relief expedition to the arctic regions.

The present bill is based upon the following petition of the widow, in which the naval history of the officer is briefly given:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 3, 1886.

To the Chairman of the Committee on Pensions, United States Senate:

SIR: The undersigned begs to represent that her late husband, Henry Jackson Hunt, was appointed a midshipman in June, 1870, and was graduated from the Naval Academy in 1875. He shortly after joined the Swatara and engaged in the survey of the Amazon River; was detached from the Swatara in 1877 and ordered to the training-ship Minnesota, from which he was detached and ordered to the ship Enterprise, of the European squadron. In May, 1880, he was detached from the Enterprise and placed on waiting orders, and in September of the same year was ordered to the receiving-ship Passaic, whence he was detached for duty in the Hydrographic Office, Navy Department.

In April, 1881, he was ordered to the ship Rodgers, sent to search for the Jeannette in the arctic seas. As a member of this ship's party he endured all the hardships, exposure, and privation incident to service within the Arctic Circle, especially in the survey of Wrangel Island and the examination of cairns on Herald Island.

After the Rodgers reached her winter quarters at Saint Lawrence Bay, she was burned November 30, 1881, on which occasion Ensign Hunt was exposed not only to the inclemency of a severe winter in extreme northern latitudes, but in his efforts at saving the lives of his comrades and the supplies for their subsistence suffered severely.

On the 8th of February, 1882, he left Saint Lawence Bay in company with his comrade, Lieutenant-Commander Berry, and traveled in sledges along the coast of Siberia to the westward as far as the Lena River, searching for the Jeannette party. Learning on arrival that De Long and some of his companions had landed in the delta of the Lena, and that one boat was missing, he at once volunteered for service to search the mouths of the Lena and the seacoast for Lieutenant Chipp, of the Jeannette, and his boat's crew, and also aided in the removal of the bodies of De Long and his party from the Lena delta to the United States. He returned to the United States, bringing with him such of the crew of the Jeannette as were saved, and was detached from the Jeannette search expedition April 13, 1883. His arctic service is thus rated at two years, in which he was conspicuous for devotion to duty, and doing all in the power of any one man to do in aid of the success of the expedition.

In March, 1883, he was promoted to the grade of lieutenant, and assigned to ordnance duty at the navy-yard at Washington soon thereafter. From this he was detached in April, 1884, and ordered to the expedition fitted out for the relief of the Greely party. During this voyage his health gave way and he was not again employed on duty. He died May 5, 1886.

HENRIETTA M. DRUM HUNT.

We also append the following letter, giving some account of the services performed by this gallant officer:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT AND RECRUITING,
Washington, May 24, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR: If it has not been done already, I would like to inclose the record of the late Lieut. H. J. Hunt, for whose widow you so kindly introduced a bill for pension.

Lieutenant Hunt's last service at sea was under my command, in the expedition sent in 1884 to the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely. I feel, therefore, that I ought to say that I believe it was the exposure of this cruise and that in the search for the Jeannette survivors that hastened this gallant young officer's death.

In performing both of these memorable services young Hunt went forth with full determination to do or die, if need be, in the effort to save those of these two ill-fated expeditions imperiled in the desolate ice fastnesses of the north; and, as his early death was in a large degree the outcome of exposure in the line of his duty in performing extra perilous service, it is confidently hoped that his bereaved widow may obtain proper pension.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. S. SCHLEY,
Commander, United States Navy,
Commanding the Greely Relief Expedition of 1884.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRISON.
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Certificates from the physicians who attended him during his last illness are also filed with your committee.

Your committee are of opinion that the premature death of this gallant young officer was a sequence of the great hardship, suffering, and privation he underwent in his service, especially in the expeditions to the arctic regions. We therefore report back the bill with a recommendation that it do pass, with the following amendment: Strike out the word "fifty," in the eighth line, and insert the word "forty" in lieu thereof.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask the gentleman in charge of this bill to state what pension this widow is now drawing. If the report makes any statement on that point, it has escaped my attention.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. She is drawing no pension now, I believe. Lieutenant Hunt died within the last year.

Mr. McMILLIN. Why has no pension been granted at the Department?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. This was an exceptional case in this respect: Lieutenant Hunt volunteered in the original Jeannette arctic expedition, and, as the report shows, served for two years, performing all the arduous duties and undergoing all the sufferings connected with that expedition. In this way his health was seriously affected. Subsequently, when the Greely expedition was being organized, he volunteered to take part in that second expedition; and I can say that, by reason of his arctic experience and of the record he had made in the Department, his services were very much desired.

At the time his health was failing the expedition went forth, but before they had reached the point he was attacked by consumption of the throat. Long before they had returned Lieutenant Hunt had entered upon the first stage of the final disease. That he clearly and distinctly lost his life because of his volunteering and engaging in this arctic expedition is as certain as any fact can be. His service is so distinct, the duty he did is so rare, that I certainly feel this a case where, leaving as he does a widow and two children without means of support, that this recommendation of $40 per month is simply an equitable and fair recognition of his gallantry in performing this rare and exceptional service. That is my answer to the question of my friend.

Mr. ROWELL. What would be the pension allowed in this case if it were granted by the Pension Bureau?

Mr. BRADY. Seventeen dollars a month.

Mr. McMILLIN. How is it that more is to be given in the case of the widow of an officer whose death did not occur on the battle-field than in the case of the widow whose husband was killed in battle? Where is there just ground upon which to base any such distinction between the two cases?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. So far as that is concerned my friend from Tennessee will understand that his point is germane and pertinent.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think if the pension be granted, it should be at the rate allowed those of the same rank who lost their lives in battle.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. There should, however, Mr. Chairman, this fact always be borne in mind, that this duty which was performed by Lieutenant Hunt is regarded as outside of the ordinary line of naval service.

Mr. McMILLIN. But voluntary, however.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Voluntary, of course. But where a young officer volunteers to undergo all the hardship and with almost the certainty that death will follow as the result of his arctic service, yet who undergoes all the hardship of such arctic service during the period of two years, and then when it is intimated to him that volunteers for another expedition are being called for, and that there is need of his service, and the Government would like to have him—I will not say the Department, and yet I might say something on that point—when it is intimated his information and experience are needed, and then this officer volunteers, although he knows it is almost certain to lead to his death, a case is presented, to my mind, distinct and different from all others for the relief proposed. Now, while it is true, of course, that his family were in no different position from the family of an officer who was killed on the battlefield, yet it appears to me there is a distinct and marked difference between the two cases.

Mr. McMILLIN. I see no higher merit in such a case as that which the gentleman has stated than in the case of an officer who volunteers for the general defense of his country in time of war and is involuntarily marched up to the cannon's mouth and dies for his country upon his country's soil. Therefore, while I doubt very seriously the policy of granting pensions before action has been taken by the Pension Bureau, yet, in view of some of the facts stated by the gentleman from Kansas, I am willing to allow action to be taken here on the case; but I think it should not be placed upon any higher ground or at any higher rate than in the case of the widow of a meritorious officer of the same rank who had been killed in battle.

Mr. ROWELL. Is there not some difference between the case of an officer who volunteers in a forlorn hope and one who obeys the ordinary orders? Is there not some difference in those two cases in favor of the officer who volunteers to lead a forlorn hope?

Mr. McMILLIN. My mind is not acute enough to see how the widow of an officer whose husband died gallantly as he did suffers any more than the widow of an officer whose husband was shot down in battle. If there is any difference at all it is in favor of the one whose husband was killed in battle. There the husband could not get away from his duty. I will not characterize it in strong terms; but the other is the case of volunteering for a duty which could have been avoided.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that army life was full of forlorn-hope expeditions. I remember a great many cases where forlorn hopes came to the rescue and where men lost their lives, but I do not remember those cases were distinguished by granting extra or exceptional pensions.

Mr. ROWELL. I recognize the fact that army life was a constant forlorn hope, but I also recognize the further fact that sometimes a call is made for volunteers to engage in more than ordinarily dangerous duty, such as going out upon these peculiarly dangerous expeditions into the Arctic regions. Therefore, as a recognition, a fitting recognition, on the part of the American people of such unusual service, it would not certainly impoverish the nation to grant a little larger pension than is usual. That is all there is of it, and that is the only point to which I wished to call attention.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move to amend by inserting the regular pension that is allowed by law for an officer of this grade, $17 a month, I understand.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I move to amend by making it thirty.

Mr. BRADY. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that he offer his amendment in this form: subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension law.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the amount had better be fixed. I have no objection, however, to the phraseology, if the gentleman from Virginia desires to offer the amendment in that form. I move the amendment as I first suggested.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Let me ask the gentleman if he would not be willing to accept a modification of his amendment and make it thirty?

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not think it well to do so for the reasons already stated, and which I think are conclusive. When you tax the widow whose husband was killed on the battle-field to pay a larger pension to one situated as this lady is, you do an act of injustice which I regard as inexcusable; but when we frame our legislation on a general principle, and stick to it, we will usually enact wiser laws, give greater satisfaction, and produce better results to all than if we undertake to act in the manner proposed here.

This widow, as I understand, could not obtain a pension at all through the ordinary channels.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Oh, yes, she could; you are entirely mistaken.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have understood from some one near me that she was not entitled to a pension.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. There is no question that she is.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then this amount that I have suggested is, I am satisfied, a reasonable and proper one.

Death is death, and the deprivation of a husband is the same in every case. Why then make an exceptional pension here and give to other widows but $17 a month? There is no difference in the two cases except a difference in favor of the man who was killed in the service of his country, for he could not have avoided the duty, while here it was a voluntary act.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. This man was killed in the service of his country, and in that respect was just as certainly killed in the service as any man who perished on the field of battle. This was a United States expedition under the command of United States officers. He was killed clearly in the line of his duty. My friend from Tennessee seems to be laboring under a misapprehension in regard to the case.

This lady is now entitled to a pension under the existing law. Without the passage of this bill she can make application and receive the pension.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think that is the proper course to pursue. I do not like this method of undertaking by Congressional action to anticipate the Pension Office, when the office is so liberal and ready to do justice to the soldiers of the country.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, as a compromise amendment, I would suggest the insertion of $25 a month.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw his amendment?

Mr. McMILLIN. I will let the gentleman offer his amendment and take a vote upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. But it can not be offered now unless the gentleman withdraws his amendment, as there are two pending.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I withdraw the amendment for the present.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, it was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN H. STUCKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. DOCKERY) was the bill (H. R. 7748) granting a pension to John H. Stucker.

The bill as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John H. Stucker, late of Company B, Eighteenth Regiment Missouri Volunteers (Grundy County Battalion Missouri Militia).

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The evidence submitted in this case shows that claimant enlisted in Company B, Eighteenth Missouri State Militia, in September, 1862, and was discharged April 23, 1864. On July 19, 1875, he filed application for pension, alleging gunshot wound of left hand, received at Alpha, Mo., while disarming a rebel bushwhacker. The claim was rejected, November 18, 1875, on the ground that he was not pensionable under existing law. The following evidence was submitted in the case:

William Dunlop, lieutenant of Company B, Thirtieth Missouri Militia, testifies that he has known claimant since 1861, and that while in the line of duty as sergeant of said company, in the northeast part of Livingston County, Missouri, claimant received a gunshot wound of left hand, from which wound he was totally disabled from military duty, and from the use of said hand ever since. Affiant says he knows the facts of which he testifies from personal knowledge.

Jonathan T. Wilson testifies that he was a member of the same company, and that, while acting under regular orders in disarming rebels, they attempted to disarm one Wilson, an acknowledged rebel and bushwhacker, when said Wilson fired upon and shot said Stucker in the hand, tearing it all to pieces. That affiant was the first to pick up said Stucker after his being shot.

Newton Buckner testifies that he was with claimant when he was shot; that they were detailed to disarm rebels and bushwhackers, and while in the line of duty Stucker was shot in the hand, badly mangling it. Affiant took care of claimant until he was able to be around again.

Dr. S. W. Elmore testifies that he treated him professionally for the wound immediately after he received it, and as long as he needed medical attendance.

The examining surgeon at Jameson, Mo., reports August 12, 1875, that—

"The left hand is useless from gunshot wound; aperture of entrance at middle of second metacarpus, destroying that and third metacarpus; shot scattering and making exit at different points on outside of hand, several shots remaining encapsuled on palm or surface of hand; hand very much deformed; bones of carpus enlarged, and wrist anchylosed; fingers drawn tight to palm, and useless; very painful at wrist and elbow joint."

This regiment was enrolled and mustered into service under a general order of the commanding officer, Department of Missouri, and was under the command of United States Army officers. Claimant did not file his application for pension until after the expiration of the limitation provided for in section 4693, Revised Statutes, and therefore the claim can not be allowed in the Pension Office.

Claims of this character have invariably been recommended by the committee and allowed by Congress, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SALLY W. RICE.

The next business on the Private Calendar called up by Mr. PETERS was the bill (H. R. 8791) granting a pension to Sally W. Rice.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sally W. Rice, dependent mother of Henry S. Rice, late of Company K, One hundred and forty-first New York Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

Claimant is the mother of Henry S. Rice, late hospital steward, United States Army, who died at Newberne, N. C., September 25, 1864. She made application for pension December 15, 1879, and the same was rejected. The records of the War Department show the death of the soldier as alleged, and the only question is that of dependence.

Dr. D. W. Hand, late medical director, surgeon United States Volunteers, testifies that—

"In 1863 and 1864 the soldier was detailed as his confidential clerk, and so continued until his death by yellow fever in October, 1864. That the soldier often talked about the feeble condition of his parents, and to affiant's certain knowledge during said two years the soldier forwarded his pay regularly to his mother, and after his death affiant visited the claimant and saw that the soldier's contributions had been of great importance to her."

A large number of letters from the soldier to his parents show that he remitted his pay to them with regularity, as received in varying amounts up to $62 at one time.

The husband of claimant was a physician at the time the soldier was in the Army, and continued in the practice for a number of years, but all the time he was in feeble health and unable to give his attention to business, so that his income from his business ran down from $700 in 1864 to about $100 per year.

S. W. Everett, of Garfield, Kans., says he has known claimant for thirty years last past; that he was a man of light constitution and feeble health, and of late years has been unable to do any manual labor sufficient to maintain his family in comfortable circumstances.

Gabriel L. Smith testifies, June 18, 1883:

"He has known Dr. Rice, the husband of Sally W. Rice, since before 1860, and that in 1830 and 1861 Henry Rice was a student in the law office of deponent, and also in 1862, up to the time he went into the Army. It may be he came in my office in 1861, but I think in 1860. Said Dr. Rice, the husband and father, was a man in poor health, and lived in the city of Elmira, Chemung County, New York, during the war and up to about 1870, according to my best recollection, but he did not succeed as a physician at all, owing to his poor health, as he would not attend a patient regularly, and would not go out in the night at all, as I knew from him and from common report. In 1870, I think it was, Dr. Rice went away out of town for a few months, but returned the same year, and tried to practice in a little village a few miles out of Elmira, called Pine City, but did not succeed any better there, and then, about 1875, he went into Pennsylvania for a few months, and then came back to Elmira and did no better than before, having no real paying business, and being always in want. I remember of hearing of his real estate being sold out on a mortgage, and his personal property being sold on a chattel mortgage, and in 1878 or 1879 he left the city of Elmira, since which time I have not known how he has got along. I do not believe for the last twenty years he has been able to support his family, and I know, so far as one can know who was not a member of the family, that he has failed to furnish a reasonable and proper support for his wife and family by reason of his poor health. This I say previous to his leaving Elmira in 1878 or 1879."

D. W. and Lydia A. Seeley, of Granger, Minn., testify, June 22, 1885:

"We were intimately acquainted with the soldier, Henry S. Rice, in his lifetime, and also with his mother, Sally W. Rice, and lived near neighbors to the said Rice family in the year 1863, and lived as near neighbors to them from that time up to the time of his enlistment in the service aforesaid; that the said son resided with his mother at home, at Elmira, N. Y., and we know that at the date of his enlistment, and for three years prior thereto, he contributed all his earnings to the support of his said parents in contributing his wages that he obtained for days-work; that the said Henry S. Rice was a single man when he enlisted in the service; that he died unmarried, leaving no widow or child or children surviving him."

S. W. Everett further testifies, July 9, 1881:

"I formerly knew them in Elmira, Chemung County, New York; then S. W. Rice (claimant) kept a private boarding house for the purposes of the family, and since she has been here (Garfield, Kans.) she has worked for me in the hotel by the week for the benefit of the family. She was sick last summer, and the friends deemed it necessary to render them pecuniary aid, and continued to do so. His income for the last four years has not exceeded $100 each year, and from his profession only."

The only property of claimant and her husband, as appears by the evidence, is 80 acres of school land in Pawnee County, Kansas, appraised at $208, on which $30 of the purchase-money has been paid, the balance running for twenty years. The case is rejected in the Pension Office on the ground that the income of the father at the time of the death of the soldier was sufficient for the support of the family. It is well established that a short time before his death the mother needed and received pecuniary assistance from the soldier, and that soon after the husband's income was insufficient for their support.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GRACE F. EDES.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. RANDALL) was the bill (S. 2144) granting an increase of pension to Grace F. Edes.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Grace F. Edes, widow of Benjamin Long Edes, late a lieutenant-commander in the United States Navy, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the reading of the House report accompanying this bill.

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill S. 2144, respectfully report that they have had the same under consideration, and report it back to the House with an adverse recommendation, and recommend that it do lie upon the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask to have read the Senate report where this bill originated.

The Senate report (by Mr. ALDRICH) was read, as follows:

That Benjamin Long Edes was appointed a midshipman in the United States Navy September 23, 1861, promoted to ensign in March, 1868, to master in August, 1868, to lieutenant in April, 1869, and to lieutenant-commander in April, 1881.

During the period of his service he was for a large portion of the time at sea; he also served at the Naval Observatory, in the Hydrographic Office, and in the Ordnance Department. In 1881 he was ordered to the torpedo station at Newport, R. I., and while in service at that station he was killed by the premature explosion of a torpedo on 29th of August, 1881. He was at the time in a boat with Lieut. L. G. Spalding, engaged in laying a mine in the stretch of water in front of the torpedo station, when, by some unknown cause, the mine, consisting of some 25 pounds of powder, was prematurely exploded, killing Lieutenant Edes instantly, and mutilating his body in a horrible manner.

His widow was left with two small children dependent upon her for support. She was completely prostrated by the manner and suddenness of her husband's death, and for a long time was wholly incapacitated from the physical exertion necessary to maintain herself and family, and she has never recovered from the shock to her nervous system.

In view of these circumstances the committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of this bill I do not want the adverse report of the House committee to weigh against it without making a statement that the committee have acted consistently and as has been their habit in such cases, which is not to report favorably any of these bills which look to the increase of pension above what the law allows, with the exception, I think, in the case of the widows of brigadier-generals, where the House itself has established the precedent.

This case is a peculiar one. There are two strong points in connection with it. One is that this officer was assigned to a hazardous duty in connection with torpedo experiments without attaching to his name in the event of his death during the experiments that glory which is incident to death on the battlefield. His death was the result of no fault of his own, or of any one as far as it has been possible to ascertain. As stated in the Senate report, the explosion was by some unknown cause. We are prosecuting experiments in this direction and are appropriating large sums to keep up the experiments, which are most dangerous in connection with this torpedo service.

The second point to which I wish to allude is the fact that this poor lady was left with two small children absolutely dependent upon her own exertions, and the sum which the law would give her is altogether inadequate to her support and that of her children.

I think this is a peculiar case of which the Senate was entirely justified in making an exception, and I hope that the consistent course of the committee in the House in this connection, in like cases, will not weigh against this, because we all understand there are exceptions to all rules. The House has taken the responsibility of granting many pensions where the committee would not. I do not know that there is on the part of the committee any disposition to resist the passage of this bill except so far as the leading object with them is to maintain their consistency, in which course I think they are commendable and entirely entitled to my respect and sympathy.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. What is the amount granted?

Mr. RANDALL. Twenty dollars additional.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And how much do the children get under the general law?

Mr. RANDALL. The widow under the general law gets $30 and the children $2 a month each.

Mr. MCMILLIN. This is a case which appeals to one's sympathy, and I do not expect by anything I can say to defeat the claim.

Mr. CUTCHEON. What is the total amount granted by the bill?

Mr. RANDALL. Fifty dollars.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But this, like the other cases, should stand under the general law. I do not believe it is either wise or well to flood Congress with cases of special applications where the very widows who do not get more than the law allows have to help to pay the additional amounts given here.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not insist on his objection.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I shall not make the point of a quorum upon the bill, but I wish to state what I think is the proper thing to be stated and to be observed; and having done so, I dislike to make any further exertion against the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I only want to add that this officer was one of the ablest officers in the Navy, and he was assigned to this duty as having the courage to go and develop this peculiarly dangerous service.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is creditable to the valor of our people that they have the courage to go wherever they are assigned——

A MEMBER. Even to Congress.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes; even to Congress. [Laughter.] But then, we first admit officers of high rank by special act of Congress, and then we go on and on, until Congress is flooded with applications for Congressional action on behalf of officers of particular rank. I believe most of the time spent here in discriminating against one class of pensioners in favor of another by special act might as well be spent in another direction.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman permit me to say to him that he will be surprised if he examines the pension payments to find how little money really is paid out of the Treasury in consequence of these acts of special legislation passed on Friday evenings as compared with the large amount paid under the general law.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have had occasion to examine that, and what I am complaining of is not the amount of money but the fact that when you enter on this class of legislation you put a premium on the bringing of special acts before Congress for relief; and you leave the hundreds of thousands who do not get special relief with just cause of complaint.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; but by such legislation as this you encourage brave officers to undertake hazardous service for their country when they feel that in doing so they have a Government which will appreciate their services if their lives are lost in that service, and which in that event will take care of their widows and their orphans.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And there has been no instance in which the Government of the United States has failed to evince that spirit. The gentleman from Pennsylvania would not be rash enough to urge that there has been any want of consideration on the part of the people of the United States toward their soldiers.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; and I want to continue a policy which presents one of the brightest spots in the history of this nation.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Precisely; and when that policy is continued in equal and exact justice to all classes of the same rank and grade, then it will continue in the same form as heretofore.

Mr. BRADY. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] that this bill does not appropriate any money out of the Treasury. It provides a pension for a widow of an officer of the Navy, and there is a special fund for that purpose.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Still, it comes out of the Treasury. The fund to which the gentleman refers is not sufficient to meet all these pensions.

Mr. BRADY. The interest of the fund is almost sufficient to pay them.

Mr. RANDALL. But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY] will understand, as I understand, that that fund is not adequate, and I do not want the House to pass this bill on the assumption that it is. The bill does, in effect, take some money out of the Treasury. The interest on the Navy fund is not sufficient to pay all of the Navy pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the motion of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I am willing the bill shall go to the House to be voted on in a full House.

Mr. RANDALL. The bill will, of course, have to be voted on in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. What motion does the gentleman from Pennsylvania submit?

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The question being taken on Mr. RANDALL'S motion, the chairman stated that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 6.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY E. HEDRICK.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 8623) granting a pension to Mary E. Hedrick.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary E. Hedrick, widow of Thomas H. Hedrick, late captain of Company K, Fifteenth Iowa Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. CONGER) was read, as follows:

Mrs. Mary E. Hedrick is the widow of Thomas H. Hedrick, late captain of Company K, Fifteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteers, who enlisted on the 29th day of November, 1861; was wounded in battle at Atlanta, Ga., July 22, 1864, and died April 18, 1885. She filed her application for pension on the 19th day of August, 1885, which was rejected on the ground "that death was not a result of wound of right arm, for which soldier was a pensioner, and not otherwise chargeable to his United States military service."

Dr. E. L. Lathrop, the physician who attended Captain Hedrick in his last illness, testifies:

"That he knew the soldier for about thirteen years; that while in the Army soldier was shot in arm, which wound was followed by gangrene; that he prescribed for soldier first in 1872 for an inactive condition of liver and chronic cough; found him emaciated, thin, and nervous at various times from 1872 to time of death; for those troubles and acute attacks was with him three to four days before death; found acute congestion of lungs, kidneys, and liver—liver almost inactive; regard his condition at that time and death as attributable to his wound and resultant disease following said wound. He was very emaciated at time of death; consider his death as caused by his physical condition, which was caused by wound received while in the Army. No post mortem was made. Physical examination showed enlargement of liver and hepatization of lower posterior lobe of lungs. Did not know soldier prior to 1872. When prescribing for him had to take into consideration his diminished vitality, caused by his wound followed by gangrene and blood poisoning."

Dr. Jason Holloway, examining surgeon, gives as the result of medical examnation, May 15, 1865:

"The wound is on the right arm. The ball entered the humerus above the middle third, shattering the bone. About 3 inches of the bone was removed; the parts became gangrenous, and extensive sloughing followed. It still continues discharging and fragments of bone passing off."

Also Dr. M. J. Davis, medical examiner, May 8, 1865, that—

"Gunshot wound of right arm, followed by exsection of the middle third (3 inches); operation not very successful and had to be repeated in a year, at which time numerous spicula of bone were removed."

Hon. G. L. Finn, of Bedford, Iowa, testifies as follows:

"That he has been well and personally acquainted with Thomas H. Hedrick for ten years, and that the last two years of his life he was a law partner and worked in same office at Bedford, Iowa, constantly with him; knew that his wound interfered with him constantly, causing him great pain, and forcing him to at times abandon his work, and believe it contributed directly to the causes of his death, and so understood from him and the doctors in charge during his last sickness; that before his final sickness he was by it reduced to so low condition of flesh and health, such as to make any severe ailment fatal; that it was understood that had it not been for such condition so induced by such wound, his last illness would in all probability not been fatal; that he had been steadily growing worse for the years affiant knew him."

General J. M. Hedrick, of Ottumwa, Iowa, on June 5, 1886, makes the following affidavit:

"In the matter of the application of Mary E. Hedrick, widow of the late Capt. Thomas H. Hedrick, for an invalid pension, I, J. M. Hedrick, of Ottumwa, Wapello County, Iowa, and late colonel and brevet brigadier-general of the Fifteenth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, have to make the following statement, to wit:

"The said Capt. Thomas H. Hedrick entered the United States service as a private in K company of the aforesaid regiment, which I then commanded, in 1861, and that he was promoted through the various grades to the captaincy of his company, and at the close of the war was brevetted major for gallant and meritorious service; that he was in command of his company at the battle of Atlanta, before Atlanta, Ga., on the 22d day of July, 1864; and that he was under my immediate observation, and while he was most gallantly performing his duty was severely wounded in the right arm near the shoulder, which required the operation of exsection, taking out 3 or 4 inches of the bone; that having been wounded at the same time myself, I was with him in the rear and in hospitals some two months, and most of the time in close proximity to him; that at Clay Hospital, Louisville, Ky., especially, he was critically attacked with gangrene in his arm and shoulder, and that his surgeon, whose name I have forgotten, informed me and him that he could not possibly live; that he had gangrene in his wound for months, and that he was more or less afflicted with gangrene and its results, to wit, blood poison, from the date of his wound; that he was frequently treated for his wound and the general disability resulting from it up to the day of his death, in April last, and that, in my opinion, his death was as directly attributable to his wound as if he had been instantly killed on the battlefield. His yellow, cadaverous, and exceedingly thin and emaciated appearance was constantly a matter of remark by his relatives and friends, after his partial recovery and return to business, who had been familiar with his rugged appearance prior to his being wounded. The said Captain Hedrick was my brother, and I had the most intimate relations with him, and the very best of opportunities to know of his services and his condition from and before receiving the wound which disabled him and resulted in his death. I may add that he had originally remarkable tenacity of life, and was perfectly free from all hereditary and constitutional diseases, which condition he inherited from the paternal and maternal sides of his family.

"I furthermore certify that I am in no way financially interested in the prosecution of this claim."

There are several other affidavits on file in the case of same character, showing distressing disability caused by the wounds, and a constant and continual drain upon his system from discharge until death. It seems to your committee a reasonable conclusion that so severe a wound, two painful and unsuccessful surgical operations, with gangrene and blood poisoning following, would have resulted in such a diseased and debilitated condition of the system as to be unable to withstand or rally from attacks of disease which under other conditions would probably have been neither serious or fatal.

Captain Hedrick gave his right arm and his health to his country. His widow was then deprived of the support and comforts which his health and strength would have furnished her. She is the widow of a brave and efficient soldier; and while there may be sufficient uncertainty in the cause of her husband's death to warrant a refusal of pension by the Pension Office, yet there is not enough to justify a refusal of relief by Congress. Therefore your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH WARD.

Mr. ELLSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (S. 2587) granting a pension to Elizabeth Ward.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension law, the name of Elizabeth Ward, the dependent widow of General Durbin Ward, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $100 per month.

Mr. SOWDEN. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2587) granting a pension to Elizabeth Ward, widow of the late General Durbin Ward, having considered the same, make the following report:

The Senate at the first session of this Congress passed the accompanying bill granting the claimant a pension of $100 per month, after a careful examination of the Senate report hereunto attached, in which his distinguished and brilliant services are fully set forth. Your committee concur in the Senate report and adopt the same as their own, with the following amendment: Strike out the words "one hundred," in the seventh line, and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty," with the recommendation that the bill as so amended do pass.

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2587) granting a pension to Elizabeth Ward, have examined the same, and report:

The applicant is the widow of Durbin Ward, late colonel of the Seventeenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, honorably discharged on account of wounds November 8, 1864, and pensioned at $30 per month, recently deceased, one of the most distinguished volunteer officers of the late war, and one of the favorite soldiers of the State of Ohio in that great struggle. His death has elicited the warmest spontaneous tributes to his patriotism and gallantry from the soldiers, not only of that State, but throughout the Union. Mrs. Ward is left in poor health, enfeebled by approaching age, and without any means of support.

This appears to be a case where a proper recognition of the daring and devotion of one of the great soldiers of the Republic, who in his lifetime failed to receive full acknowledgment and proper reward, demands of the country as a small tribute to his sacrifices and his worth a full provision for the comfort and support of his surviving and helpless widow. Your committee are not prepared to recommend the high rate of pension provided for in this bill except in a very few and most conspicuous instances of high desert. To give less than this amount in the present case will, we are satisfied, be deemed unsatisfactory to that strong public sentiment which has been manifested in this case. The Grand Army of the Republic, and it may be said the whole State of Ohio, demand it, and we believe that the whole country will cheerfully respond to the action of the committee.

We append hereto the memorial signed by leading citizens of the State of Ohio, many of them soldiers; also a sketch of his military career and statement submitted by Mr. CAMPBELL, member of Congress of Ohio, who is familiar with all the circumstances and condition of the claimant, as well as with the services and character of her distinguished husband.

We report back the bill and recommend its passage.

LEBANON, OHIO, May 26, 1886.

To the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, this day attending the funeral of General Durbin Ward, in view of his distinguished services as a soldier, permanently disabled on the field of battle, and of the fact that he leaves no estate for the support of his family, would most earnestly pray for the speedy passage of a law giving to his widow, Mrs. Elizabeth A. Ward, a pension of at least $100 per month. She has no property other than the house in which she lives, and this is heavily incumbered. And we especially request the Senators and Representatives from Ohio to urge the passage of such a law.

General Durbin Ward, of Ohio, was one of the most distinguished and useful volunteer soldiers of that State. He is credited with having been the first person to enter the ranks, as he began to raise a company before the attack on Sumter. He rose by merit and valor to be colonel of the Seventeenth Ohio Infantry Regiment and a brevet brigadier-general. Whitelaw Reid, in "Ohio in the War," thus writes of him:

"He participated in the battles of Wild Cat, Mill Springs, Corinth, Perryville, Stone River, Hoover's Gap, Tullahoma, Chickamauga, and throughout the Atlanta campaign, during which he commanded his regiment with his left arm in a sling, from the effect of the very severe wound he received at the battle of Chickamauga. Throughout his military career he was a bold, zealous, fighting officer, having the full confidence of his men."

General Ward was also a man conspicuous for his eloquent speeches and inspiring letters. The same authority above quoted says of him: "Some of the most fervid and effective addresses from the Army to the voters at home came from his pen."

With his sword and pen General Ward has served his country too notoriously to render a recital necessary. During his life, which terminated in May, 1886, he received a pension for his severe wounds. His death occurred after a few weeks' sickness with inflammatory rheumatism resulting in blood-poisoning. There is no doubt that his death was hastened and probably caused by his wounds, but it is not thought that the chain of medical history can be made necessary to comply with the technical rules of the Pension Office.

This bill proposes to pension his widow, who is in advanced years and reduced circumstances. The passage of the bill is petitioned for by the leading citizens of Ohio, headed by Allen G. Thurman, and is especially desired by the Ohio department of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended an amendment striking out, from line 7 in the printed bill, the words "one hundred," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "fifty;" so as to make the provision read, "a pension at the rate of $50 per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BETSEY COONEY.

Mr. HAYNES. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 9426) granting a pension to Betsey Cooney.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll at $12 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Betsey Cooney, sister of Stephen Cooney, late of Company C, Third Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. HAYNES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9426) granting a pension to Betsey Cooney, submit the following report:

This claim is based upon the service of Stephen Cooney, who was mustered into the United States service in August, 1861, in Company C, Third New Hampshire Volunteers, and died of wounds received at the battle of Drewry's Bluff, Va., in 1864, and is buried in the national cemetery at Hampton, Va.

Cooney was but twenty-one years old when killed, and left a mother and two sisters. The mother was pensioned at his death, and died about a year ago. The two sisters are still living. One, the beneficiary named in this act, has been blind from birth, and her only support is from the labor of the other sister, who is herself partially crippled, and only able to do a light work known as "drawing in" at a cotton mill, which can be performed sitting. It is only a question of time how long she can perform this, as it requires good eyesight, and both are not far from fifty years old.

It is shown that up to the time of his death he contributed materially to the support of his mother and his unfortunate sisters.

These facts are stated under oath by John C. Linehan and Henry F. Brown, who are known by a member of this committee to be gentlemen of the very highest reputation and veracity. Both have known the family since a period before the war, and both served in the same regiment as the soldier.

This blind, dependent sister can have no standing before the Pension Office under the rules by which its action is circumscribed, but the equities of the case are so overwhelming in her favor, and her condition so pitiful, that we have no hesitation in recommending the passage of the bill for her relief.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

OWEN P. WILSON.

Mr. HALSELL. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 6069) granting a pension to Owen P. Wilson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Owen P. Wilson, of Edmundson County, Kentucky, dependent father of James R. Wilson, deceased, late a private in Company I, Twenty-seventh Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) was read, as follows:

Claimant states that he was dependent on his son, the soldier, at the time of his death.

The records of the War Department show that soldier died of typhoid fever while in the Army.

The claim was rejected on the ground that claimant was not dependent upon soldier at the time of his death.

Mr. J. T. Coats testifies that at the time of soldier's enlistment claimant was not in good health, and had no property except a farm which affiant sold him, which was poor land, and claimant was not able to improve it by clearing more.

Mr. Richard Holton confirms the above statement.

Dr. Hatcher certifies that he was well acquainted with claimant ten years prior to 1870, and knows that he was not able to support himself and family for several years.

Oliver P. and Margaret Shackleford state that claimant was not an able-bodied man at soldier's enlistment.

Mr. Gideon McDaniel states that in 1861, 1862, and 1863 claimant was able to do about one-half labor.

Assessor's record show that claimant was the owner of 400 or 530 acres of land, assessed at from $400 to $1,000 from 1862 to 1872, and from 1872 to 1882 it was assessed in the name of his wife.

Mr. James Esters states that the soldier contributed to claimant's support at the time of his (soldier's) enlistment.

Richard Holton, Taylor Coats, William Holton, and Dabney McDaniels corroborate the statement of Mr. Esters.

An examination by a United States examining surgeon finds claimant diseased, and rates his disability for manual labor at three-fourths of his time.

Claimant is now seventy-four years old. He is dependent upon the generosity of his children for support and unnamed legacy in his wife's will.

In view of the testimony, claimant's age, and his inability to perform manual labor your committee are of the opinion that the claim is meritorious, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ISAAC RANSOM.

Mr. FUNSTON. I call up the bill (S. 2334) granting a pension to Isaac Ransom.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isaac Ransom, late a private in Company C, Forty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, for such diseases as now exist.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2334) granting a pension to Isaac Ransom, submit the following report:

The following report from the Senate Committee on Pensions contains a statement of the facts in this case as disclosed by the papers on file:

"That the records in this case show that claimant was a private in Company

C, Forty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and enlisted October 15, 1861, and was discharged September 13, 1865. It also appears that claimant was pensioned for rheumatism from September 14, 1865, to December 31, 1880, when the pension was discontinued on the ground that claimant had recovered from the disease. It was claimed originally that soldier was sunstruck four times while in the service, but the claim was not allowed, and he was pensioned for rheumatism.

"The records show that claimant was a sound man prior to enlistment; that he was a good soldier. The fact of his having been sunstruck is testified to by his captain, John Nafius, by the assistant surgeon of the regiment, and also by Capt. John M. Williams; also by the regimental surgeon, who treated him for other diseases besides rheumatism contracted in the line of his duty.

"There is also abundant testimony from the claimant's neighbors, who knew him before enlistment and after his discharge, showing that he was a sound man when he enlisted; and since his return from the Army he has been unfitted by his disabilities from performing manual labor."

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment striking out the words "for such diseases as now exist," in line 5.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommend an amendment striking out from line 5 of the printed bill the words "for such diseases as now exist."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH O'BRIEN.

Mr. PINDAR. I call up the bill (H. R. 9130) granting a pension to Sarah O'Brien.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Sarah O'Brien, widow of Hugh O'Brien, late a private in Company C, One hundred and seventieth New York Infantry Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CAROLINE P. BOLTON.

Mr. LYMAN. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 9004) for the relief of Caroline P. Bolton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll of the United States the name of Caroline P. Bolton, mother of Edwin W. Bolton, deceased, late a member of Company I of the Twenty-first Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, subject to the provisions, limitations, and restrictions of the pension laws.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CAROLINE SEES.

Mr. SOWDEN. I call up the bill (S. 1207) granting a pension to Caroline Sees.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Caroline Sees, of Harrisburg, Pa., widow of Maj. Oliver W. Sees, at the rate now allowed to a widow of a major of volunteers.

Mr. COWLES. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) was read, as follows:

As the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions fully sets forth all the facts of the case, your committee adopt it as their own, and report the bill favorably, and ask that it do pass.

The report of the Senate committee is hereto attached.

The claimant, Caroline Sees, is the widow of Oliver Sees, late a chief of transportation and telegraphy on the staff of Maj. Gen. D. M. Couch, commanding the Department of the Susquehanna during the invasion of Pennsylvania by the Confederate army in the month of June, A. D. 1863.

The widow states in her petition that she was married to the soldier September 28, 1857; that her husband was appointed chief of transportation and telegraph department in the militia of the State of Pennsylvania by an order of the governor; that he continued in the discharge of the duties of said office until the invasion of the State of Pennsylvania by the Confederate armies in June, 1863, when, the United States having assumed the payment of the expenses of the transportation of the militia, he was placed temporarily in their service, and assigned to a position upon the staff of Major-General Couch, commanding the Department of the Susquehanna. He was also one of the trusted custodians of the secret signals and ciphers used in the military service of the United States. These facts also appear by the documents submitted in support of this claim.

It also appears that after thus being virtually taken into the service of the Government, and while in the discharge of the duties devolving upon him on the staff of General Couch, as well as on the battlefield of Gettysburg, he contracted disease from which he died on September 30, 1863.

M. S. Quay, ex-secretary of state of Pennsylvania, and now State treasurer, states under oath that he was well acquainted with Major Sees; that he was employed in the service of the United States at the time of the invasion of Pennsylvania by the Confederate army under General Lee, and that the extraordinary labors and duties during the period he served upon the staff of General Couch, and subsequently in the care of the sick and wounded soldiers at and after the battle of Gettysburg, produced the illness and disease of which he died.

Eli Slifer, who was secretary of the Commonwealth during the whole period of the war, corroborates the above, and says:

"That the pressure upon Major Sees was so great and long continued that health and strength gave way and nature proved too much exhausted to rally, and speedy dissolution followed. As the husband and father in the duties under which he succumbed rendered far greater services to his country than he possibly could have done in the field, and his death was as clearly occasioned by those services as if he had fallen in battle, the petitioner would respectfully suggest that the widow and children of Major Sees are entitled to the liberal compensation which the humane and just policy of the Government awards to the dependent survivors of its fallen defenders."

The papers show that Major Sees was treated during his last illness, but the physicians are now dead.

No application has been made at the Pension Office, inasmuch as the claimant has been advised that as her husband was not formally commissioned or enlisted in the military service of the United States, notwithstanding his disease was contracted while in active service, such application would be futile, as her case does not come within the purview of any general law.

Your committee, however, are of opinion that this case does come within the spirit of the pension laws, and is one of just that class which it is the province of Congress to provide for by special act. There would seem to be no doubt that this brave officer lost his life in the service of his country, and we therefore report back the bill, and recommend that it do pass with the following amendments:

Strike out all after the word "Sees," in the sixth line, to and including the word "three," in the eleventh line; also strike out all after the word "volunteers," in the twelfth and thirteenth lines.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LIVINGSTON CLARK.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 7547) granting a pension to Livingston Clark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll of the United States, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Livingston Clark, late of Company G, Twenty-first New York Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) is as follows:

That it appears from the papers on file in the Pension Office that the claimant enlisted as a private in Company I, Thirteenth Regiment New York Volunteers, December 5, 1861, for two years. It is clearly established by the evidence that the claimant at the time of his enlistment was in sound health and mentally bright.

The report of the Surgeon-General shows as follows:

"Livingston Clark appears on a list of sick and wounded on board hospital transport Elm City, July 1, 1862; diagnosis and disposition not stated. That Livingston Clark entered G. H. McKim's mansion, Baltimore, Md., July 1, 1862; diagnosis not stated, and was transferred July 6, 1862. He entered post hospital, Fort McHenry, near Baltimore, Md., July 8, 1862, with bronchitis; disposition not stated. He entered convalescent hospital, Fort McHenry, near Baltimore, Md., July 10, 1862; diagnosis not stated, and was discharged from service August 9, 1862. No hospital records of the Thirteenth New York Volunteers were ever on file."

His certificate of discharge shows him discharged August 9, 1862, for phthisis pulmonalis.

Dr. David Little testifies that he was surgeon of the Thirteenth New York Volunteers during its two years' service; that he knew the claimant.

"That claimant was ill in regimental hospital from May 24 until the latter part of June, when in the course of the seven days' fight he was left at Savage Station. The disease for which claimant was under deponent's care was diarrhea, probably of a severe nature, else he would not have been an inmate of the regimental hospital."

The evidence shows that he re-enlisted in Company G, Twenty-first Regiment New York Cavalry, December 23, 1863, and was discharged July 7, 1866; that the regimental records and company books are not on file.

The condition of claimant while in his first service, and the fact of his sickness, is fully shown by the Surgeon-General's report, and also by the testimony of witnesses.

As to claimant's condition during his last service there is but little evidence.

There is the testimony of several witnesses, whose character is fully indorsed, showing him at his first enlistment to be a strong, healthy, bright man; that since his discharge from the service he has been in feeble health, gradually failing both mentally and physically, until now, and since December, 1883, he has been in a state of idiocy, and totally incapacitated from performing any labor or business, and has been an inmate of the poor-house of the county where he resides—a public charge. That it further appears that during nearly, if not quite, the whole time his claim was being prosecuted at the Pension Office, he was in such a condition mentally as to be of very little, if any, assistance in procuring evidence in his behalf. He has a wife and one child, with no means for their support except their own manual labor.

His claim for pension was filed in May, 1883, and was finally rejected for want of sufficient proof.

It seems reasonable to suppose that his claim might have been successful if the claimant had been in such a condition mentally as to have aided in procuring the necessary evidence.

The committee believe in view of the extreme poverty of the claimant, and his long-continued mental imbecility, and his being a public pauper, and the fact of his service to his country as a faithful soldier, that his case is a meritorious one, and therefore recommend that the bill do pass, with the following amendment added thereto: "The amount of his said pension to be paid to his duly appointed committee or trustee for his benefit."

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended an amendment, adding to the bill, after the word "cavalry," the words "the amount of his said pension to be paid to his duly appointed committee or trustee for his benefit."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH M. KING.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 9443) granting a pension to Elizabeth M. King.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth M. King, mother of Dudley King, late a lieutenant of Company C, Eighty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, during the war for the suppression of the rebellion.

Mr. SOWDEN. I ask that the report in that case be read. The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) was read, as follows:

The claimant is the mother of Dudley King, who enlisted at the age of eighteen years in Company C, Eighty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, July 25, 1862, was promoted to second lieutenant of Company K, same regiment, March 6, 1864, and to first lieutenant of Company F, of said regiment, March 30, 1864. He was wounded in battle, near Atlanta, Ga., August 13, 1864, and died same day from the effects of said wound, leaving neither wife nor child surviving him.

The mother's claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the evidence failed to show dependence upon the soldier son at date of his death.

The father of the soldier and husband of the claimant was at time of the son's death about sixty-five years of age, and died in 1879. The records of the county in which he resided show that in the year of the son's death his property, real and personal, was assessed at $2,500.

Dr. A. M. Ellsberry testifies that during the late war and up to 1879 he was the family physician of the claimant; that in 1864 claimant's husband was considerably enfeebled from age and nervous prostration, of which he died in the month of April, 1879.

There are with the papers on file in the Pension Office in this case several letters written by the soldier to his parents while in the Army, all referring to contributions made to them out of his pay, and showing that as high as $100 at a time were sent home by him for the use and benefit of claimant and her husband.

Old age and accompanying debility gradually reduced the value of claimant's husband's estate, so that after his death there was not sufficient property left to pay the claimant one year's support. She is now eighty-five years of age, and dependent upon the charity of friends.

Your committee are of opinion that this is an extraordinarily strong case, and as the Pension Office holds that because claimant's husband at the time of the son's death did earn something for her support by the practice of his profession, that of a lawyer, she is not provided for by the general pension law, we are of opinion that the relief asked for should be granted, and therefore report favorably on the bill, and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH C. WRIGHT.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I desire to call up the bill (S. 1614) granting a pension to Sarah C. Wright.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah C. Wright, widow of John W. Wright, late of Company D, Seventy-seventh Regiment enrolled militia of Missouri, and who was pensioned by special act of Congress approved January 31, 1885.

Mr. COWLES. Let us hear the report.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The facts in this case are fully set forth in the following Senate report. Congress has invariably granted pensions in similar cases.

Your Committee recommend the passage of the bill.

"John W. Wright, the husband of Sarah C. Wright, was a member of Company D, Seventy-seventh Enrolled Missouri Militia. In his original application for a pension he claimed that he was shot through the left breast and left arm during the charge of the First Missouri Cavalry by mistake. The Pension Office rejected his application on the ground that he was not in the military service of the United States, and not entitled to a pension under existing law. Inasmuch as he was enrolled to aid the Union Army, and was nearly killed by bullets fired by those who were in the service of the United States, he was pensioned by a special act. Having recently died, his widow appeals to Congress. The requisite proof of the death of her husband and of their marriage is in the hands of the committee. It is also shown that he died, after years of suffering, of the wounds received in the manner described.

"The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT POTTS.

Mr. SWOPE. I ask consideration of the bill (H. R. 9119) granting a pension to Robert Potts. This is a bill which was introduced by the late member from New York, Mr. BEACH.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Robert Potts, formerly a member of Company F, Third New Jersey Volunteers, for rheumatism and resulting disease of heart.

Mr. SOWDEN. Let us hear the report.

The report was read in part, when Mr. SOWDEN said: I do not ask for the further reading of this report.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CLARA B. DAVIDSON.

Mr. MORRILL. I call up the bill (S. 2321) granting an increase of pension to Clara B. Davidson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Clara B. Davidson, widow of General John W. Davidson, United States Army, and pay her a pension of $50 per month, in lieu of the amount she is now receiving.

Mr. COWLES. I ask for the reading of the report in this case.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is hereto attached, sets forth fully the military history of the gallant officer whose widow now asks an increase of pension. Congress has invariably granted the amount asked for to widows of officers of this rank, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 1306, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

The claimant, Clara B. Davidson, is the widow of John W. Davidson, late a major-general, United States Volunteers. She was pensioned at the rate of $30 from August 6, 1881. The present bill proposes to increase this amount to $50.

The following statement of the military services of this officer has been filed with the committee:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 26, 1886.

Statement of military service of John W. Davidson, late of the United States Army, during the war of the rebellion, compiled from the records of this office.

He served as captain with his regiment—First Dragoons—in California from January 3 to some time in November, 1861; promoted major Second Cavalry November 14, 1861; was en route to and in the Army of the Potomac to February 20, 1862. He was appointed brigadier-general United States Volunteers February 3, 1862, and commanded a brigade in the Army of the Potomac from February 21 to July 24, 1862; absent, sick, to August, 1862; commanded the district of Saint Louis, Mo., to November 13, 1862; the Army of Southeast Missouri to February 23, 1863; the district of Saint Louis, Mo., to June 6, 1863; the cavalry division, Army of Arkansas, to February, 1864, and the cavalry depot at Saint Louis, Mo., to June, 1864; was chief of cavalry, military division of the West Mississippi, to January, 1865; commanded the district of Natchez, Miss., to June 13, 1865; the sub-district of Southwest Mississippi to July 17, 1865, and the southern district of Mississippi to January 17, 1866, excepting while on leave from October 28 to December 16, 1865. He was honorably mustered out of the volunteer service January 15, 1866. He was breveted lieutenant-colonel United States Army June 27, 1862, "for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Gaines's Mill, Va;" colonel June 28, 1862, "for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Golding's Farm, Va;" brigadier-general March 13, 1865, "for gallant and meritorious services at the capture of Little Rock, Ark.;" major-general March 13, 1865, "for gallant and meritorious services in the field during the war," and major-general United States volunteers March 13, 1865, "for meritorious services during the war."

J. C. KELTON,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Additional statement by Clara B. Davidson, the widow of the deceased General John W. Davidson, who is the applicant for the increase of pension under this bill.

John W. Davidson graduated at the Military Academy in 1845. He served in the Mexican war as a second lieutenant, and also served faithfully and honorably all during the war of the rebellion.

The non-commissioned officers and privates of the Third Iowa Cavalry presented him with a magnificent sword, costing $2,000, for his gallantry and bravery in the capture of Little Rock. That sword is now in my possession. He never wore it but once, and that was on the occasion of the obsequies in commemoration of President Lincoln, at Natchez, Miss., 1865.

At the commencement of the war he was captain of the First Dragoons, and when General Sidney Johnston said: "Davidson, you must come with us; you belong with us in our army, and we will make you a general," to which General Davidson, though a Virginian by birth, family ties, and education, replied: "Oh, no, general, I'll stand by the flag that I promised to protect." And this he said, although his brother Hunter Davidson, and his uncle Thomas Hunter, each of the Navy, had joined the Southern Confederacy, and he did his duty as a good and honorable soldier.

His grandfather Davidson, from South Carolina, served in the Revolutionary war, and was a general officer. He was killed in an action against General Tarleton. His father, William Benjamin Davidson, was a graduate of West Point, and served in the regular army as captain of the Third Artillery, under General Harney, during the Indian wars of Florida.

"In the Army of the Potomac, under General McClellan, General John M. Davidson had a sunstroke in a battle in July, 1862, that shattered his system so severely that he never recovered entirely from the effects of it. He was on duty at Fort Custer at the time he received injuries that caused his death, and that was in this wise: On the 7th of February, 1881, an officer had reported that the beef was fed on refuse forage from the stables, and he went, accompanied by Lieutenant Hoppin, the commissary, down to inspect the forage, and it being an intensely cold day, the horses were very restless, and the one upon which General Davidson was riding gave a sudden spring and turned a somersault, precipitating him over an embankment 20 feet deep, which was covered with snow. The saddle struck him in the side and stomach, breaking two of his ribs, which the doctors say caused cancer of the stomach, from the effects of which he died on June 26, 1881.

"Having raised and educated a large family before his death, he left no money for my support, and I am compelled to rely entirely upon my pension for my support during the remainder of my life."

Your committee, after a consideration of all the facts in this case, and in view of the many precedents for this increase, report back the bill and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BENJAMIN OBEKIAH.

Mr. HIRES. I ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 2173) granting a pension to Benjamin Obekiah.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Benjamin Obekiah, late of Company K, Twenty-second United States Colored Infantry, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID B. CALDWELL.

Mr. ROMEIS. I call up the bill (H. R. 7390) granting a pension to David B. Caldwell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David B. Caldwell, late a lieutenant of Company I, Seventy-fifth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELVIRA BLISS SHELDON.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask the consideration of the bill (S. 2029) granting an increase of pension to Elvira Bliss Sheldon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elvira Bliss Sheldon, an ex-Army nurse, and widow of Joel S. Sheldon, late a commissary and lieutenant of volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the pension now received by her.

Mr. COWLES. I ask for the reading of the report in this case.

The report was read in part, when

Mr. COWLES said: I will withdraw my demand for the reading of the report, if the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] will make a brief statement of the reasons in favor of granting this pension. The proposition appears rather extraordinary.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, a very few words will suffice to explain this bill, which has passed the Senate and been favorably reported upon by the Committee on Invalid Pensions of this House. Mrs. Elvira Bliss Sheldon is the widow of Lieut. Joel S. Sheldon, of the Sixth Michigan Cavalry, who lost his life in consequence of his services in the army. She served herself for more than two years as an army nurse in the hospitals of this city, and also in the field. While serving in the field at City Point, during the siege of Petersburg, she was stricken down with that malignant disease, camp fever, which was succeeded by chronic diarrhea, from which she has suffered up to the present time. She is now, and has been ever since the war, a chronic invalid. She has no dependence in the world, except her little pension of $17 a month, which this bill proposes to increase to $30.

I am somewhat acquainted with Mrs. Sheldon. She has resided in this city, attempting to eke out a subsistence by type-writing and things of that sort; but her health has so completely failed that she has now absolutely no dependence but her small pension. So far as I am aware, she has no friend or relative in the world to whom she can look for support. This bill proposes to give her a pension of $30 a month, being an increase of $13 upon what she is now receiving. I hope there will not be a single vote against the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY GRIMES.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I call up the bill (H. R. 9247) granting a pension to Mary Grimes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll of the United States the name of Mary Grimes, the mother of William Grimes, late a private in Company K, Twelfth Regiment New York Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LOUISE AMBRECHT.

Mr. BRADY. I call up the bill (S. 1201) granting a pension to Louise Ambrecht.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Louise Ambrecht, the widow of Augustus L. Ambrecht, late a surgeon in the Army of the United States.

Mr. BRADY. There is evidently a mistake in the draughting of this bill. I move to amend by striking out, in the last line, the word "surgeon," and inserting "sergeant."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FREDERICK RICHMOND.

Mr. ELLSBERRY. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 9444) granting a pension to Frederick Richmond.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Frederick Richmond, late a private in Company B, Thirty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, now insane, payment of pension to be made to his legally constituted guardian.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ABBIE B. HEATH.

Mr. PERKINS. I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 1997) granting a pension to Mrs. Abbie B. Heath.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Abbie B. Heath, widow of John T. Heath, late of Company B, Twenty-fourth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PHILA CLARK.

Mr. WEBER. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 8847) for the relief of Phila Clark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Phila Clark, dependent mother of Olin Clark, late of Company C, Eighth New York Heavy Artillery Volunteers.

The amendment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions was read, as follows:

After the word "authorized" insert "and directed;" so it will read, "authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," &c.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORRIN P. COOLEY.

Mr. ROWELL. I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 1844) granting a pension to Orrin P. Cooley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Orrin P. Cooley, late of Company C, Forty-second Illinois Volunteers, at $25 per month, from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions was read, as follows:

Strike out "at $25 per month, from and after the passage of this act," and insert in lieu thereof "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CLARA M. TANNEHILL.

Mr. CONGER. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 9672) granting a pension to Clara M. Tannehill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Clara M. Tannehill, blind daughter of Martin V. Tannehill, late of Company D, Thirty-fourth Regiment Iowa Volunteers, and pay her a pension of $12 per month from and after the passage of this act.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MICHAEL TODD.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 7335) granting a pension to Michael Todd.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Michael Todd, father of James H. Todd, deceased, late of Company K, Sixty-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANTHON EITAPENCE.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 2330) for the relief of Anthon Eitapence.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Anthon Eitapence, of Utica, N. Y., father of Adam Eitapence, late of Company H of the One hundred and forty-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM HUTCHISON.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4852) granting a pension to William Hutchison.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Hutchison, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "Hutchison" the words "late a private in Company H, First Regiment Tennessee Volunteers, in the Mexican war."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to, and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. MARGARET CASHIN.

Mr. LITTLE. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 5398) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret Cashin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret Cashin, widow of Patrick Cashin, late of Company D, Forty-fourth Ohio Volunteers, and Company M, Eighth Ohio Volunteers.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ISAAC ASKIE.

Mr. O'HARA. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 8485) granting a pension to Isaac Askie.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Isaac Askie, late a private in Company C, Thirty-seventh United States Colored Troops, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. SWOPE moved to reconsider the several votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM B. BARNES.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I have not been recognized to-night, and now ask the indulgence of the House to submit a request for unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9250) for the relief of William B. Barnes, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William B. There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SWOPE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet at 3 o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That would not be in order, as it is a change of the rule.

Mr. LONG. Regular order.

Mr. SOWDEN. I move, then, to make it 12 o'clock on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the motion to adjourn the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] moves that when the House adjourns it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was not agreed to.

The motion of Mr. SWOPE was agreed to; and accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 8, 1887.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EMPLOYÉS IN STATE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a list of the employés in that Department, stating the time actually employed, and that they are usefully employed, and that their services can not be dispensed with; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, and ordered to be printed.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF THE TERRITORIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with inclosures, estimates from the Secretary of the Interior of appropriations for the publication of volume 3, book 2, final report of the United States Geological Survey of the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Attorney-General of an additional appropriation for continuing the investigation of French spoliation claims; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

O. M. LARRAWAY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, with inclosures, recommending that the account of O. M. Larraway, postmaster at Minneapolis, Minn., be credited with amount of loss by burglary, and that an appropriation be made therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, a schedule of Indian depredation claims examined prior to January 1, 1887, with the determination of the Department thereon; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN M'NAUGHTON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1877) for the relief of John McNaughton, with an amendment by the Senate.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask unanimous consent that the House proceed to the immediate consideration of the Senate amendment, and that it be concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "due said John McNaughton for services rendered the United States as second lieutenant" and insert "of a first sergeant."

There being no objection, the amendment was considered and concurred in.

Mr. THOMPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House bills of the Senate of the following titles; which were read twice and referred as indicated:

The bill (S. 309) to settle and adjust the claims of any State for expenses incurred by it in defense of the United States—to the Committee on War Claims.

The bill (S. 474) for the relief of George W. Saulpaw—to the Committee on War Claims.

The bill (S. 1359) for the relief of the heirs of Erskine S. Allin—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 1651) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make final adjustment of the claims of certain foreign steamship companies, arising from the illegal exaction of tonnage dues—to the Committee on Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. REAGAN, indefinitely.

To Mr. GALLINGER, for one week, on account of sickness.

To Mr. LYMAN, indefinitely, on account of death in his family.

To Mr. CANDLER, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

JACOB COPES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] asks to have the bill (H. R. 3406) granting a pension to Jacob Copes, which was reported adversely yesterday by the Committee on Pensions, placed upon the Calendar. The gentleman has the right to have that done, and it will be so ordered.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. A memorial of the constitutional centennial commission was referred to the Committee on the Library. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] asks that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Chair thinks that is the proper reference, and if there be no objection the memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There was no objection.

MOBILE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER. Yesterday the House passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 72) to provide for the settlement of accounts with the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company. This is a resolution which came over from the last session of Congress. It appears from the RECORD it was amended by the Committee of the Whole House, but in the engrossment of the joint resolution the amendment was omitted. The Chair thinks the correction ought to be made before the joint resolution is transmitted to the Senate.

Mr. OATES. I was in charge of this joint resolution and offered the amendment myself. It was by an oversight that it was omitted from the engrossment. In fact I had forgotten about it or I would have called attention to it yesterday and would have asked that it should be passed upon and incorporated in the bill before the vote was taken. The amendment was adopted in the Committee of the Whole without dissent. I ask unanimous consent that the correction be made.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the joint resolution will be again engrossed and the amendment included. The RECORD shows that the amendment was offered by the gentleman from Alabama, in Committee of the Whole House, and agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HERBERT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SINGLETON. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to withhold the call for the regular order for a moment, that I may call up for action at this time the joint resolution (S. R. 90) appointing James B. Angell a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to fill a vacancy.

Mr. HERBERT. I think we ought to have the regular order.

Mr. SINGLETON. This will not take more than a moment.

Mr. HERBERT. I must insist on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

INDIAN TRAINING SCHOOL, OREGON.

Mr. HAILEY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 2060) to authorize the purchase of a tract of land near Salem, Oreg., for the use of an Indian training school; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Mr. WILKINS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H.

R. 10305) to increase the appropriation for the public building at Brooklyn, N. Y.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HOUSTON, TEX.

Mr. DIBBLE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with amendments the bill (S. 93) authorizing the construction of a public building for a post-office in the city of Houston, Tex.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DENVER, COLO.

Mr. DIBBLE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 1592) to change the limit of appropriation for the public building at Denver, Colo.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARIA L. STRONG.

Mr. SWOPE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 2708) for the relief of Maria L. Strong; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

APPOINTMENT OF CIVIL OFFICERS.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 512) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the appointment of civil officers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

STEAMER NUEVO MOCTEZUMA.

Mr. DUNN, from the Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 10199) to provide for an American register for the steamer Nuevo Moctezuma, of Philadelphia, Pa.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of the committees for reports is now completed. The hour for consideration of bills reported by committees begins at 12.30 p. m., and the call rests with the Committee on Manufactures.

The SPEAKER (when the Committee on Mines and Mining was called). The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HILL] was compelled to leave the city temporarily, and he requested that when this committee was reached in the call it should be passed.

Mr. CLARDY. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that that may be done without objection.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. JOHNSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. 2871) for the relief of Semon, Bache & Co.; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 1034) for the relief of Bangs, Brownell & Co.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 7192) to provide a school of instruction for cavalry and light artillery, and for the construction and completion of quarters, barracks, and stables at certain posts for the use of the Army of the United States; also that the Senate requested a conference with the House upon said bill and amendment, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. MANDERSON, Mr. HAWLEY, and Mr. HAMPTON.

PUBLIC BUILDING, CHARLESTON, S. C.

Mr. DIBBLE (when the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was reached). I call up the bill (H. R. 10051) for the construction of a public building at Charleston, S. C. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering that bill; and, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon each bill called up by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be limited to five minutes.

Mr. STORM. I object.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Better have no debate at all.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, is that intended to include the reading of the report?

The SPEAKER. The reading of a report would be in the nature of debate. However, objection is made by several gentlemen to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

The motion of Mr. DIBBLE was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10051) for the erection of a public building at Charleston, S. C.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise provide a site and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office and the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other Government uses, at the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina. The site of the said building shall not exceed in cost the sum of $100,000; and the building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $400,000; and no purchase of site, nor plan for said building, shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sums of $100,000 for the site and $400,000 for the building; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of South Carolina shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

SEC. 2. That as soon as the said building shall have been erected and occupied for the uses of the Government the Secretary of the Treasury shall advertise for sale, and shall sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, for cash, the site and building now used and occupied as a post-office in the city of Charleston, and damaged by the recent earthquake shock in that city; and the proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the Treasury.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

Mr. DIBBLE. Will that come out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir.

Mr. DIBBLE. Well, I understand that I retain the floor, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] has the floor. The report will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The post-office building in the city of Charleston, S. C., was so badly damaged by the earthquake of August 31, 1886, that it will be necessary to take it down. It has been rendered safe for temporary use by timber props within and timber braces on the outside; but this was done simply to meet the immediate necessities of the Government. An emergency exists, therefore, for an immediate appropriation to provide permanent accommodations for the post-office of that city.

Prior to the earthquake three public buildings were occupied by the Government in the city of Charleston. Two of them, the old club-house building, purchased and formerly used for the sessions of the United States circuit and district courts, and the post-office building, are so much injured as to be beyond the possibility of permanent, substantial repair. The club-house building is a complete wreck, and the post-office building is propped up, as hereinbefore stated, so as to be used temporarily. The United States courts are now held in the custom-house building, the main structure of which is not damaged, except in the ceilings and plastering, and only the porticoes and parapets of which have suffered displacement and fracture. The space occupied by the United States courts is needed for other branches of the public service, and the location of the custom-house building is exceedingly inconvenient for the sessions of the courts.

The present post-office site is entirely occupied by the building, the front entrance of which encroaches several feet upon the sidewalk, and which is only 90 feet long by 50 feet wide, and it is incapable of enlargement from the fact that it is bounded on each side by a public street or thoroughfare. The building is a very old one, erected in colonial days, when Charleston was a small settlement of about one-tenth of its present area, and about one-thirteenth of its present population, as the council building of the British province of South Carolina.

It seems to be a measure of economy to erect the new building required upon a larger site, and to combine in its appointments the necessary accommodations for the United States circuit and district courts, as well as for the city post-office and railway mail service; and to use the custom-house for the accommodation of all remaining Government officials; and they occupy two sound and fire-proof and well-appointed structures, instead of three buildings, as heretofore.

In consequence of the recent experience of earthquake disturbance at Charleston, while it is to be hoped that the city will not suffer from so severe a visitation in the future, yet in planning a structure sufficient to withstand such a contingency it will be requisite to occupy a larger area of ground than usual in order to get the floor space ordinarily gained by adding stories. Hence, it is not deemed prudent to rebuild on a site which is only 90 feet by 50 feet, giving a surface area of only 4,500 square feet.

A suitable building, constructed of the most substantial materials, and built with a special view of sustaining considerable vibratory shock without demolition or serious injury, will require for its erection, in the opinion of the Supervising Architect, the sum of $400,000, and in this view the committee concurs.

The ordinary postal facilities for a city of over 60,000 inhabitants are to be supplied; and in addition the officers of the railway mail service between Charleston and Wilmington, N. C., Columbia, S. C., Savannah and Augusta, Ga., Jacksonville and Key West, Fla., and intermediate points, in charge of a chief clerk, with a large force of railway postal clerks, who handle, among other mails, the fast mails on the Atlantic coast line, having as its terminal points Boston, Mass., and Tampa, Fla., and embracing the Cuban foreign mails.

The United States circuit and district courts, in general or special term, or in admiralty business, are in session about three-fourths of the year; while all original writs in civil cases for suits in Federal courts, in any part of the State of South Carolina, are issued from the offices of the clerks of such courts in Charleston, where all the records are kept.

The reports made to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to the Supervising Architect, concerning the condition of the post-office building are hereto appended as a part of this report.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I desire that the report be read in full.

Mr. DIBBLE. The report has been read. There are some appendices to it which have not been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the reading of the report has been nearly completed and the Clerk will now complete it.

The Clerk resumed the reading, as follows:

CHARLESTON, September 2, 1886——

Mr. DIBBLE. I have the floor; the reading of the report is in my time, and I claim that it has been completed.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the closing sentence read by the Clerk declares that the exhibits are made a part of that report. That is the statement of the committee. Now if the exhibits are a part of the report, I desire that they be read.

Mr. DIBBLE. Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has no parliamentary right to have the report read. I have the floor, and merely as a matter of saving time and with due regard to other bills which the committee desire to present, and not for the sake of excluding from the knowledge of the House any matter in connection with this bill, I ask that the reading of those exhibits be deferred, as they will consume all the time. I move that the committee now rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is in order.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. DIBBLE; and the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to raise a question of order. The House is now engaged in the reading of this report, which was directed to be done; and I submit the reading should be concluded before the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina can be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] that under the rules the reading of the report has been in the time of the gentleman from South Carolina. The Chair deferred to the request of the gentleman from Iowa for the reading of the report, because the gentleman from South Carolina acquiesced in it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Can I not, as a matter of right, call for the reading of the report?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman would have the right to call for the reading in his own time.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the ruling just made by the Chair can not be just, because at present I have no time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have the rule read for the satisfaction of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

It has been held, and that ruling on appeal sustained, that the reading of the report accompanying the pending proposition can not be demanded as a matter of right except in the time of the member making such demand. It has been repeatedly held that the reading of a report is in the nature of debate, and of course such reading must be governed by the rules regulating debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole has decided to rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10051) for the erection of a public building at Charleston, S. C., had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of House bill No. 10051, and pending that motion I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the pending bill be limited to ten minutes, of which (if the motion prevail) I am willing to give the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] eight minutes. On this motion I call the previous question.

Mr. HEPBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it in order at this time to limit all debate—general debate and the debate upon amendments?

The SPEAKER. The motion does not affect the debate on amendments, but proposes simply to limit the general debate on the bill. The House has no power now to close debate on amendments.

The question being taken on ordering the previous question upon the motion to limit debate, there were—ayes 100, noes 8.

Mr. HEPBURN. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HEPBURN and Mr. DIBBLE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 160, noes 3.

So the previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. Dibble to limit debate to ten minutes was agreed upon.

The question then recurring on the motion of Mr. DIBBLE that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10051) for the erection of a public building at Charleston, S. C.

The CHAIRMAN. On this bill general debate is, by order of the House, limited to ten minutes. The gentleman from South Carolina is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DIBBLE. I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. DIBBLE. In deference to the other bills, and as I know the sentiment of the House to be in favor of the city of Charleston in this matter, whose people to-day are going on erecting their private buildings and have been increasing in progress and population instead of declining, as I could show if I had the time by statistics—in deference to the other bills demanding attention, I will now move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BURROWS. Are we not entitled to have the bill read by sections for amendment?

Mr. DIBBLE. I will withdraw my motion until the gentleman from Iowa has consumed his two minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask that the bill be read by sections for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read, of course, by sections for amendment. That is the gentleman's right. The Clerk will read the first section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase or otherwise provide a site and cause to be erected thereon a substantial and commodious building, with fire-proof vaults, for the use and accommodation of the post-office and the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other Government uses, at the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina. The site of the said building shall not exceed in cost the sum of $100,000; and the building thereon, when completed upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed in cost the sum of $400,000; and no purchase of site, nor plan for said building, shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sums of $100,000 for the site and $400,000 for the building; and the site purchased shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until a valid title to the said site shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of South Carolina shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to strike out "$400,000" wherever it occurs in the first section, and in lieu thereof to insert "$100,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. DIBBLE. I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 172.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have another amendment to offer.

Mr. DIBBLE. I submit my motion is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is. The gentleman can move to rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. STORM. Can the committee rise while any member desires to make an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. By all means.

Mr. STORM. But the gentleman's motion is to rise for the purpose of limiting debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to rise takes precedence.

Mr. STORM. If the motion to limit debate carries, does that cut off all amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is offered in the House and not in the committee.

Mr. HEPBURN. I demand a division on the motion to rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 149, noes 3.

Mr. HEPBURN. No quorum has voted.

Mr. DIBBLE. A quorum is not necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum is necessary.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10051) for the erection of a public building at Charleston, S. C., and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to further consider the bill (H. R. 10051) and, pending that, I move that all debate on the bill and amendments thereto be limited to five minutes, on which motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. HEPBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEPBURN. The second section of this bill has not yet been considered. I ask if it is competent now to entertain the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina?

The SPEAKER. It is not if the point of order is made. The House can only limit debate upon the section which has been read.

Mr. HEPBURN. I make that point of order.

Mr. DIBBLE. Then I make the motion to conform to the point of order. I move that all debate upon this section and amendments thereto be limited to five minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to limit debate in that way. There are some very important questions here.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 111, noes 6.

Mr. HEPBURN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. HEPBURN and Mr. DIBBLE were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; but before the result of the vote was announced the hour expired.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business, being the bill in relation to the debts of the State of Georgia.

Mr. HERBERT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to further consider the special order, being the bill (H. R. 7635) to consolidate certain bureaus of the Department of the Navy, and for other purposes.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 88, noes 3.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. HERBERT were appointed tellers.

Mr. HERBERT. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 151, nays 33, not voting 135; as follows:

Mr. DUNN with Mr. DINGLEY, on this vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

CONSOLIDATION OF NAVAL BUREAUS.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7635) to consolidate certain bureaus of the Department of the Navy, and for other purposes.

By unanimous consent all general debate on the bill has been limited to three hours; one hour and a half to the friends of the bill and the remainder to those opposing it.

Mr. GOFF. The Secretary of the Navy, in his report dated November 30, 1885, says:

> There is something radically wrong with the Department, and a reform in our organization is indispensable.

He also, in his report, styles the organization of the Department as "vicious." I take it for granted that the Secretary, in the instances that he cited, with the addition of the report that has been filed by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and which is the report of the majority of that committee, together with the citations given by the witnesses who were examined before that committee, and the eloquent orations, I may say, that have been delivered on this floor by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], gives all the reasons why the present organization of the Department is considered vicious. We are to presume, at least, that everything has been said in favor of the report, that everything has been adduced that the Secretary of the Navy found it in his power to lay before this House for its consideration.

The organization of the Department then is on trial to-day; an organization that has existed from 1842 down to the present time; an organization that was formulated into life, I may say, in the year 1842, and was at that time really the essence of the then existing management of the Department. While, theretofore, it had been conducted by a board of commissioners—the naval commissioners—when this organization was effected in 1842 they simply divided out among the officials of the Department those duties that, theretofore, those officers had virtually performed under the guidance of the commissioners.

Now, then, the system that has been so in force—I may say since the foundation of the Government, with but slight modifications—this system to-day, we are told, is vicious, and is fit only to be abolished. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that a system which has wrought the great results that this system has wrought, that has done the great good that this system has done, is not, ay, can not be vicious.

The system then is on trial. The Secretary of the Navy is the prosecutor. This Congress is the jury. Will you tell me, sir, upon what evidence you will condemn? I say here now that neither the Secretary of the Navy, nor the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, nor the gentleman from Texas, nor the gentleman from New Jersey, nor a single witness who testified before the Naval Committee gave us a single reason why the system itself is "vicious." On the contrary—and I challenge denial—on the contrary every isolated instance that they have cited, if it be upon this that they rely, was a mere instance of maladministration, or mistake on the part of subordinate officers, and not of viciousness in organization. Every instance that the Secretary cites in his report, and I take it for granted the Members of the House have read it, and I will not now detain them by rereading it, is a mere citation of the acts of subordinate officers of the Department, that, if they were mistakes or wrongs, the Secretary himself could have remedied by the mere stroke of his pen.

I challenge the chairman of this committee, who laughs at that statement, to deny it in his remarks.

A MEMBER. He may deny, but he can not disprove it.

Mr. GOFF. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], in his remarks upon this bill a few days since, read to this House those citations of the Secretary, and passages from a report made by a board that was appointed by the Secretary; and then strangely and illogically, as it seemed to me, argued therefrom that it demonstrated beyond cavil that the organization itself was in fault.

Now, I ask the gentlemen who propose to vote for this bill if the organization of the Department is defective, and these instances prove it, how do you remedy the evil by passing this bill? We are told that the bureau system is defective and vicious, and yet, Mr. Chairman, we are asked here to re-enact the bureau system. The bureau system is not done away with—not in a single instance. We are told by the majority of the committee that they abolish certain bureaus; but I call the attention of this House to the fact that, while they abolish them in name, they breathe into them again the breath of legal life, and create them again as divisions of other bureaus.

You say you want responsibility, and you want that this divided responsibility as it exists to-day shall cease. But I say that on the contrary, instead of having responsibility, you diffuse it among subordinate divisions of bureaus that have not hitherto existed. I ask this House, I ask the gentlemen of this committee who will follow me in this discussion, to point out wherein I err in this particular. If the system is vicious the system should be changed. If my friends base their arguments in favor of this bill upon the citations that have been made by the Secretary and the committee, then those citations show that the bill they are advocating to-day has no standing in this House.

Let us see for one moment what this organization is. The organization of the Navy Department, as now provided for by law, is to be found in sections 415 to 426, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States. We have now eight bureaus in that Department—the bureaus of Yards and Docks, of Equipment and Recruiting, of Navigation, of Ordnance, of Construction and Repair, of Steam Engineering, of Provisions and Clothing, and of Medicine and Surgery. Will you tell me, Mr. Chairman of the Naval Committee, which one of these bureaus you will abolish? I concede you recommend an abolishment in name; but in effect will you tell me which one of these bureaus you abolish?

Mr. HERBERT. What does the gentleman say about the Bureau of Yards and Docks?

Mr. GOFF. I will speak of that in a moment.

Mr. HERBERT. And of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting?

Mr. GOFF. Do you abolish that?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, sir.

Mr. GOFF. I say that as bureaus they are abolished, but as subdivisions they must necessarily be retained; and they are in every instance, except the case of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. And, Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman has called my attention to that point at this time, because it is utterly impossible for this great Department of the Government to be conducted in a satisfactory and efficient manner without a Bureau of Yards and Docks. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], who advocated this bill the other day, conceded, when he was questioned, that this was the weakest point of the committee's bill, and said he believed that the Bureau of Yards and Docks in all of its original dignity and power should be retained in the Department. Now, then, I say to the chairman of the committee, if that bureau is abolished absolutely by this act, then, under the general grant of power given to the Secretary to diffuse the duties of the Department among his subordinates, he will be compelled to assign to one of those subordinates the duties heretofore performed by the Bureau of Yards and Docks. I ask the chairman of the committee is not that true?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes; but I say there is no such division as yards and docks provided for.

Mr. GOFF. Certainly not. But the duties of it, as now performed, must be provided for, and performed by some one somewhere.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Then the proposition is to abolish the name but to keep the substance.

Mr. HERBERT. As a matter of course the duties are to be performed, but they are placed elsewhere. There is no such division as yards and docks created by the bill.

Mr. GOFF. I have conceded that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HERBERT. There is neither a division nor a bureau of yards and docks, but the duties are, of course, to be performed.

Mr. GOFF. There is neither a bureau nor a division of yards and docks provided for in this bill, but the work of that bureau as it now exists must be done, and should this bill pass, then the Secretary, under the act, will assign the work now done by that bureau to one of the new bureaus provided for in this bill, under the general power given him. You have it here in this proposed section, which provides that the business of the Department of the Navy shall, except as otherwise provided by law, be distributed, in such manner as the Secretary of the Navy shall judge to be expedient and proper, among the following bureaus.

Then comes the enumeration of the five bureaus that your bill creates.

Mr. HERBERT. Instead of eight.

Mr. GOFF. Yes; five bureaus instead of eight. I will discuss that presently. Now is it proposed to dispense altogether with yards and docks? The gentleman says, no. Certainly he must say that. Can we have a Navy, can we construct great vessels, can we repair them, can we utilize them, without such a bureau or division? I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that we have not to-day docks of proper size and capacity at which to dock the vessels we are now constructing; and his committee, recognizing that fact, has reported to this House the absolute necessity of an appropriation of nearly two millions of dollars for the purpose of constructing docks. Is not that true? The Secretary calls the attention of Congress to the lamentable condition in which the yards and docks are. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] alluded to that the other day, and called attention to the fact that more than fifty million dollars had been expended for yards and docks, yet that the buildings were in a ruinous condition, and that we really had no docks for our vessels.

The Secretary says that an appropriation of a million and a half of dollars should be made to repair the yards and docks, and then—wonderful to me it seems, extremely farcical it appears—he comes into this House and recommends that the bureau which has charge of the construction of the new docks, which he advises us to provide for, shall be abolished, and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs acquiesces in that suggestion!

We are to appropriate at this present session of Congress $2,000,000 for the repair and extension of yards and docks, and at the same session we are to abolish the Bureau of Yards and Docks. It seems to me that if the Secretary of the Navy, under this general grant of power, assigns to some one of these bureaus (as the chairman concedes and must concede he will do) the duties now discharged by the Bureau of Yards and Docks, then it is much better for us to retain that bureau in all its dignity and power, and to provide that the President of the United States shall appoint a man, who shall be confirmed by the Senate under the Constitution, to perform the duties of this great office.

You want responsibility; then give us responsible men.

You require to have men in charge of these bureaus and in the discharge of these great duties who do not dread the head of the Department. You require men there whose tenure of office is secure. You do not want men detailed by a mere order of the Secretary and permitted for a time to perform these duties, holding their commissions and their authority simply as long as it pleases the head of the bureau, or so long as they dance to the music of the imperial head of the Department. I say that the head of that bureau should not be so situated, and should not be placed in such a position by any bill that we pass here.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am advised by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs that his bill proposes five bureaus instead of eight. That, I suppose, is in the line of "reform." That is in the line of "economy." It is the kind of economy that we have been treated to lately. We are to have five bureaus instead of eight, the gentleman says. Will he tell us how many subdivisions we have in those five bureaus? We have four subdivisions. Now, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that instead of eight bureaus we shall have virtually nine, because these subdivisions are and must of necessity be bureaus, at least in the sense in which he uses the word. So we shall have nine chiefs.

But that is not all. In addition thereto, we have three members of a council that we have never had before. Nine and three make twelve; therefore, we have twelve officers instead of eight. And that is not all. We have also under this bill a chief accountant whom we have not had before; and this officer, added to the twelve, makes thirteen. Therefore, we have thirteen officers instead of eight. That is economy; that is the diffusion of power, is it? Where is your concentration and your responsibility? That is in the nature of the reorganization which the Secretary of the Navy recommends! If so, then your claim for economy is a false claim, and your "reform" diffuses and does not concentrate responsibility.

Is it not true, then, that you have four subdivisions and five bureaus, making nine? Therefore, when you call my attention to the statement that you have five bureaus instead of eight, I say, as the gentleman from Maine remarked a moment ago, that the change is only in name, not in fact.

It is very captivating, Mr. Chairman, to come in here and preach economy and reform in that manner; but I say when you analyze this bill, when you look at these subdivisions and bureaus, and this new council, and your chief accountant, you have thirteen officers instead of eight; and you increase the expenditure of that Department vastly. No man here who will examine the matter in the light of the existing law and the proposed changes will controvert the statement I make, or can do so successfully.

Now, as I said a moment ago, we have these eight bureaus under the organization of 1842; and it is proposed now to dispense with a number of them. Hitherto it has been conceded, both in legislation and in practice, that the staff corps and the line should be kept separate to a certain extent, so far as the different bureaus or corps were concerned. That is reasonable; that is sensible. We do not expect our surgeons and physicians to preside in our courts of justice; nor do we take our great jurists and ask them to perform surgical operations. Neither do we take naval constructors or naval architects, place them upon our vessels of war, and expect them to command them in great engagements. But we do expect a line officer to command a vessel after it has been constructed by those whose duty it is to do the work. We would not take the admiral, although we expect him to do great things in engagements, and expect his attention to be exclusively devoted to the details of construction or steam-engineering. And such has never been the practice in this Department from 1842, when it was reorganized by statute, down to the present time.

Now, I would like my friend on the other side, when he comes to speak upon this bill, to explain, if he can, to the satisfaction of this House why, in doing away with the Bureau of Construction and Repair, the Bureau of Steam Engineering, the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, and placing them under one general head, he does not provide in his bill that the chief of the Division of Steam Engineering shall be, according to the old law and according to what has always been the practice, a Chief Engineer in the Navy. You do not do so. You put a line officer (let him be an expert constructor, if you please) over your great bureau of material and construction; but over the subdivision of that bureau, where the Bureau of Steam Engineering is merged, you let a man, so far as the law is concerned, step in and hold that position who is not an engineer at all.

If there is a reason for this I should like to hear it. The omission is not accidental, because attention has been called to it on several occasions. I ask this committee, is this right? Gentlemen, do you believe that the interests of this Government in its Naval Department will be benefited by an enactment which thus, I may say, totally annihilates one of the great departments of the Navy? We have men who are great experts in this business, who have spent years of their lives in it——

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman will allow me to ask him whether he does not understand that the words "who shall be skilled in naval architecture," at the end of the second section, would apply in the case to which he refers?

Mr. GOFF. No, sir.

Mr. BUCK. The provision could very easily be amended, so as to apply in that way. I think it does now.

Mr. GOFF. The gentleman suggests that the language of the bill can very easily be amended——

Mr. BUCK. It was understood in the committee that the language I have quoted would cover (though possibly it does not) the first clause of the section. It was my intention, at any rate, that it should do so.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What does the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK] understand the words "skilled in naval architecture" to cover?

Mr. BUCK. In my judgment, those words at the close of the section would cover both the preceding clauses. The section now reads:

That the chief of the bureau of material, construction, and repair may be appointed from civil life or from the active-list of officers of the Navy, who shall be skilled in naval architecture.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the gentleman think that language would require skillfulness in marine engineering?

Mr. BUCK. I think it would require a person skilled in naval architecture.

Mr. GOFF. With all deference to my friend from Connecticut, I do not agree with him.

Mr. BUCK. I am ready to vote for an amendment which will remove all doubt upon that point.

Mr. GOFF. I will read the section, and then ask whether there can be any question as to the construction which would be put upon this language:

SEC. 2. That the chief of the bureau of material, construction, and repair may be appointed from civil life or from the active-list of officers of the Navy, who shall be skilled in naval architecture.

That is, the chief of this bureau under whom you place these men who for a half century we have been educating for this expert duty——

Mr. BUCK. You assume that an incompetent man will be appointed.

Mr. GOFF. I am assuming no such thing. I am assuming that this House will be incompetent if it permits this bill to be enacted. I am assuming that we should act as incompetents if we should place at the head of this bureau a man so skilled and then have the great duties of the office performed by a person not an expert himself, and who can be detailed by the mere stroke of the Secretary's pen, and who, if he does not perform his duties in a manner to please the chief of the bureau, can be sent back to his ordinary duties with the frown of the Department upon him.

If that is the reform you want, save the Department from it. If you believe by such legislation as this you are going to benefit the Department of the Navy, you are greatly mistaken. My friend from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK], I infer at least from his interruption, deems the point I make is a good one, but he endeavors to claim it is protected in the second section, and therefore my criticism is not well taken. I submit to the House I am right, and I believe the gentleman, when he examines this question, will admit that I am correct.

Why, gentlemen, this is only one of the many inconsistencies in which this bill abounds—only one of the many. Will you tell me why, also, in your division of construction and equipment you do not have a like provision? You do away with a great bureau, you make it a division of a new bureau, and yet I say there is no provision in the bill which makes the chief of that division an expert in the duties of the division as created. Let me call the attention of the House to the character of legislation on this subject which has existed from 1842 down.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from West Virginia yield for that purpose?

Mr. GOFF. I do.

Mr. HERBERT. There is no intent at all but that the chief of construction shall be a man skilled in that work, or that the chief of engineering shall be anything else than a chief engineer. If the bill be amended in that particular, I, for one, should not object. There is no purpose to do otherwise than as I have indicated.

Mr. REED. Do you intend to have the heads of these divisions confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. HERBERT. No, I do not.

Mr. GOFF. It is only provided that chiefs of bureaus shall be confirmed. The heads of divisions are to be designated by the Secretary.

Mr. HERBERT. There is no such purpose as the gentleman imputes to it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. My colleague from West Virginia is discussing the bill as it is before the House, and not as it might have been presented.

Mr. GOFF. I know not what the intention of the chairman of the committee may be—probably that is a little broad, too, because I was with him in committee—but I say it is fair for me now here, leaving the secrets of the committee to the committee, to speak on this floor of the bill presented to the House.

Mr. HERBERT. The committee covers no secrets of mine. I never in committee or anywhere else advocated, or for a moment supposed the chief of the division of engineering should not be an engineer. There is nobody who advocates the bill who has an idea of putting at the head of one of these divisions any but one qualified for the positions, at the head of engineering a chief engineer and at the head of construction a constructor. It is so palpable that is the intention it was not thought necessary to put it in. I say for one I will not object to an amendment which will remove that objection.

Mr. GOFF. Does the gentleman think that provision should be in the bill?

Mr. HERBERT. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. GOFF. You do not think it should be in?

Mr. HERBERT. No Secretary is ever going to do anything else but put a man to build the hull of a ship who knows something about the work, and to put a man to the construction of an engine who knows something about steam-engineering. What we want to-day is to coordinate these men all under one control so that the work of building the hull of a ship as well as the engine of a ship shall be done by those who are best fitted for that purpose. That is all.

Mr. GOFF. That is all, the gentleman says. Has not the Secretary control of all the bureaus now? Is not the Secretary of the Navy to-day the man to whom you allude?

Mr. HERBERT. No, sir.

Mr. GOFF. No, sir. I say under the acts of Congress as they read to-day the Secretary of the Navy is the chief of that Department, and he has absolute control over all its bureaus. He can mold them to his will. He can direct them as he pleases under this law. He has done so, and he will do so. To say there is no power in the Secretary to call these bureaus to an account and make them do the proper thing is to say, in the light of this law, that which at least is uncalled for, and might be termed nonsensical.

Mr. HERBERT. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman and take his time, but I wish to say right here that the Secretary of the Navy is not now and never has been skilled in the building of ships. He wants to have some one under him who is more or less skilled, who knows more or less what needs arise from day to day, whom he can hold immediately responsible for everything connected with the building of a ship, its engines and equipment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Why does not he do it?

Mr. HERBERT. Why does not he do it? Simply because the law stands in the way now, which erects a Bureau of Engineering and another of Equipment.

Mr. GOFF. Point to the law.

Mr. HERBERT. He has three bureaus, every one independent.

Mr. GOFF. The powers and duties of each can be, in fact are, prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HERBERT. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I do not mean to take his time.

Mr. GOFF. I will answer the gentleman. The act of 1842 gave the Secretary experts at the head of all the bureaus. The Secretary advised with them, but he controlled their action. The chairman of the committee now wants the chief of the bureau also to have an intermediary—in other words, the true and responsible expert is to speak through another to the Secretary; now there is but one in each bureau. Who is he? Why, he is the Chief of the Bureau of Construction. He is the Chief of the Bureau of Engineering, and——

Mr. HERBERT. That is two men, is it not?

Mr. GOFF. Certainly it is two men; but now I will meet you on that point by the very provisions of your own bill. There are eight men under the present organization of the Department; will there not be five under yours?

Mr. McKENNA. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Under the present bureau system is the Chief of the Bureau of Naval Construction required to be a person skilled in that particular branch of the service?

Mr. GOFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKENNA. Is your construction of the law so broad—I mean now the bill you are discussing—as to prohibit the President from appointing a line officer to that duty?

Mr. GOFF. There is no question about it. Under the bill, as it is now offered to the House, the President can appoint a line officer, and one who has never given any attention whatever to the duties of the particular division of steam engineering. No gentleman can look into the question carefully and come to any other conclusion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is provided by section 422 of the Revised Statutes that—

> The Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, of the Bureau of Navigation, and of the Bureau of Ordnance, shall be appointed from the list of officers of the Navy not below the grade of commander.

Again, it is provided by section 423 that—

> The Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair shall be appointed from the list of officers of the Navy not below the grade of commander, and shall be a skillful naval constructor.

Mr. BUCK. We have substantially the same provision.

Mr. GOFF. Now, my friend says they have substantially the same thing. We have substantially the same as to the bureau of material, construction, and repair, but not a word as to the divisions to which I am alluding.

Mr. McKENNA. Is it necessarily true that the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair must be a naval architect? Does not that designate a quality instead of a class of officers; and might not a line officer be appointed by the President under the words of the bill you have been discussing?

Mr. GOFF. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. McKENNA. Then it would require an amendment to the bill so as to provide that he should be a skillful naval constructor.

Mr. GOFF. But you must remember that he is now the head of a bureau. I am talking of the subdivisions into which it is proposed to divide the bureau.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is it not a fact that the words "naval constructor" in the statute have a technical meaning?

Mr. GOFF. They have always been so construed.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It requires that the Chief of the Bureau of Naval Construction shall be of the grade of naval constructor. That is the present law and has been so interpreted to this date.

Mr. GOFF. Now it is provided also, by section 424, that—

> The Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering shall be appointed from the chief engineers of the Navy and shall be a skillful engineer.
> SEC. 425. The Chief of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing shall be appointed from the list of paymasters of the Navy of not less than ten years' standing.
> SEC. 426. The Chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery shall be appointed from the list of surgeons of the Navy.

Now, in the present bill there is no provision except as to the chief of the bureau of material, construction, and repair, that I have just been alluding to and have had this friendly controversy with my colleagues about, as to the requirements of expert knowledge on the part of the chiefs of bureaus, and when you come to the divisions in these bureaus there is not the slightest allusion as to the qualifications of the heads of the divisions.

My friend, the chairman of the committee, seems to think that immaterial. I think it most material. I say the head of the division should be an expert, and should not be designated by the chief of the bureau, nor by the Secretary. Remember, that the chief is appointed by the President, confirmed by the Senate, and is to perform all duties hitherto performed by the Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, and the engineer now becomes a mere subordinate officer of the bureau of material, construction, and repair.

The chief of that bureau can ask the Secretary to detail an engineer officer of the Navy to-day, and if that officer does not agree with the head of the bureau, does not indorse his views on any particular point, then he can be sent back to other duty. He is not nominated by the President or confirmed by the Senate, and if there were no other objections to the bill than this—affecting the four subdivisions of the bill—it would, in my opinion, be fatal. Officers of this grade, and for the discharge of such duties, should not be so assigned to their positions, and should not hold their place on such frail tenure.

My friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] in his argument the other day, and the chairman of the committee a moment ago, states there is no central authority, that there is no way by which the business of this Department can be conducted in an economical manner, by which we can see at a glance the condition of the Department or center the responsibility upon any one head. There never was a greater mistake. Section 420 of the Revised Statutes provides:

> The several bureaus shall retain the charge and custody of the books of records and accounts pertaining to their respective duties; and all of the duties of the bureaus shall be performed under the authority of the Secretary of the Navy, and their orders shall be considered as emanating from him, and shall have full force and effect as such.

And I say to my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] there was not one single case that he cited, or that the Secretary himself has cited, of "maladministration" in that Department—if you choose so to call it—that could not have been corrected by an order of the Secretary himself under existing law. If there was such a case I would like the gentleman now to call my attention to it.

Mr. SAYERS. Does the gentleman from West Virginia not remember a letter addressed by Secretary Chandler to the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, calling his attention to extraordinary expenses at one particular time?

Mr. GOFF. I do.

Mr. SAYERS. Was that order obeyed, and were the expenses cut down?

Mr. GOFF. The gentleman's question concedes that an order of the Secretary is sufficient. The chief of the bureau responded to that letter and gave the Secretary reasons why in his opinion that order should not be enforced, and the Secretary of the Navy seeing that the reasons were of great force and that to enforce the order would be to mutilate the navy-yards, withdrew it. The Secretary could have enforced his order if he had deemed it proper. But in this exercise of a wise discretion he did not.

Mr. SAYERS. Then I understand the gentleman from West Virginia to say that while under the present law the chief of each bureau may be authorized to purchase, under the appropriations given to that particular bureau by Congress, whatever supplies may be necessary, still the Secretary of the Navy has a right to divert that appropriation from that particular bureau?

Mr. GOFF. I have said nothing of the kind. But my friend was much mistaken when he said the Secretary of the Navy has not charge of all the appropriations made for the naval establishment. While the appropriations made by Congress are made directly to these different bureaus, to be expended by them, not a cent of that money can be expended without the order of the Secretary.

Mr. SAYERS. But the question I mean to ask is this: Can the Secretary divert an appropriation from a particular bureau to another bureau if the exigencies of the service require it?

Mr. GOFF. If the gentleman is referring to a direct appropriation by Congress to a special bureau, I should say not.

Mr. SAYERS. That is the trouble now.

Mr. GOFF. That is no trouble; that is right. If that is a trouble, will not the five bureaus which it is proposed to establish under this bill labor under the same difficulty?

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir; because in this bill two of these bureaus are put in one bureau.

Mr. GOFF. But I say the five bureaus under this bill will have the same difficulty. If that is a fault of organization it will apply to your new system as well as to the present system.

But not one dollar of money can be expended except by order of the Secretary, under the forms provided. You talk about the money being squandered, and about there being no central head, and about the funds being dissipated here, and dissipated there; I tell you every dime of that money goes out of that Department by virtue of the legislation that has existed for half a century. Every form is prescribed by the Second Comptroller of the Treasury. Section 273 of the Revised Statutes says:

It shall be the duty of the Second Comptroller to report to the Secretaries of War and of the Navy the official forms to be issued in the different offices for disbursing the public money in those departments, and the manner and form of keeping and stating the accounts of the persons employed therein.

Now, if these bureaus are keeping these books, as you say, and it is utterly impossible to ascertain the financial status to-day, it is owing to the fact that the Second Comptroller of the Treasury has prescribed those forms. It is not owing to the fact that the heads of the bureaus do not know their duty and do not perform it. And not only does the Second Comptroller prescribe these forms, and say how these books shall be kept, but we have another Department officer, the Fourth Auditor, with his fifty odd clerks, who does nothing under God's heaven but sit by and cast up the accounts sent in by these bureau officers. And yet we are told there should be an accountant in the Department. What will you do with the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury? We have an accountant there now, and he performs these duties, and has performed them well.

It does seem to me if gentlemen would examine the mode of appropriation and the manner of expenditure and see what careful safeguards are thrown around all the money appropriated by this Congress and expended by the Navy Department these wonderful criticisms that have been made here would not be submitted.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GOFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Is it not true that the Fourth Auditor has nothing to do with the accounts at all until after the expenditure has all been made?

Mr. GOFF. Certainly; that is what I have just said.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. No account is audited until months perhaps after the expenditure has been made.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That would seem to be an essential element of auditing. An account can not well be audited till it has transpired.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. The purpose of this bill is to see that the appropriations are properly expended, and this can only be done before the expenditures are made, and not after.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the gentleman from West Virginia this question: Do I understand him to say that the method of purchasing supplies by each one of these bureaus is more economical and more efficient than it would be if one single person had the charge of that particular duty?

Mr. GOFF. I will answer that question. You have one single person in charge of that particular duty. Now, what does that one single person do? He goes to the Bureau of Yards and Docks and says, "What do you want?" The bureau then proceeds to make out its requisition. Then he goes to the Bureau of Steam Engineering and says, "What do you want?" And the chief of this bureau makes out its requisition.

Mr. SAYERS. And as the bureaus are now constituted, if one bureau has a surplus of supplies that is needed by another bureau the chief of the latter bureau goes forward and makes his purchases notwithstanding that the Government owns supplies of the very same character which this bureau needs.

Mr. GOFF. That is another question altogether. That is a matter the Secretary of the Navy has under his express control.

Mr. SAYERS. If this bill becomes a law, when one particular bureau makes a requisition on the purchaser of supplies he looks to the amount of supplies there are on hand, and disburses from them.

Mr. BOUTELLE. There is nothing of that kind in this bill. It does not change the rule as to that which prevails in these bureaus.

Mr. GOFF. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] is jumping about from one thing to another. We were on one proposition and he is now calling my attention to another.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will my friend from West Virginia permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GOFF. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. In conversing about this bill I understood if one bureau has one hundred thousand dollars' worth of supplies of a particular character which another bureau requires the other bureau, as the law now is, as I understand, is required to purchase them instead of going to the bureau which does not need them but has them, and have them transferred to it.

Mr. GOFF. That is not done under the law; but that has been done some times.

Mr. BOUTELLE. This bill does not touch that at all.

Mr. GOFF. It is a fault of administration and not of organization.

Mr. BOUTELLE. There is no provision in this bill to touch that at all. It does not touch the periphery of it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not know as it does, but it has been presented here as an argument in favor of this bill.

Mr. GOFF. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us go a little further. I will read section 161 of the Revised Statutes:

The head of each Department is authorized to prescribe regulations, not inconsistent with law, for the government of his Department, the conduct of its officers and clerks, the distribution and performance of its business, and the custody, use, and preservation of the records, papers, and property pertaining thereto.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then, if my friend will indulge me, I understand that it is perfectly competent for the Secretary of the Navy to correct this abuse, if any such abuse exists?

Mr. GOFF. There is no doubt about it. Gentlemen may proclaim to the contrary, but they have not the ability on this floor, in the light of the law as it is written, to demonstrate any such thing.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then, if the abuse spoken of exists, it is the fault of the Secretary and not of the law?

Mr. GOFF. Undoubtedly.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] said a moment ago that the Secretary had no power to divert appropriations from one bureau to another.

Mr. GOFF. He has not.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Then if materials purchased by one bureau are not needed by that bureau, and are needed for another—construction, for instance—can the Secretary divert the appropriation by assigning it to construction?

Mr. GOFF. Now, you touch upon an evil of administration. The original fault there is that there has been an improper purchase made, and made with the consent of the Secretary, and the Secretary himself is responsible for it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And not made in pursuance of proper estimates?

Mr. GOFF. Certainly not. The Secretary himself has been derelict in his duty when such a thing occurs.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. That does not answer the question.

Mr. GOFF. It does answer the question.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. No. You have taken the position here (which is undoubtedly correct) that the Secretary has no power to divert appropriations from one bureau to another. Now, if he can not divert the cash, he can not divert supplies, and hence we find vast amounts of property in one bureau which are needed in another, and which the Department, under the present system, has no power to transfer or use, because the law does not allow the Secretary to divert an appropriation made for one purpose to another purpose.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then bring in a bill to remedy that evil.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. We have a bill here which does remedy it entirely and perfectly.

Mr. GOFF. Will you tell me why the Secretary made those purchases—he could do the same thing under the proposed law—or why the bureau officers recommended it?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. No, sir. I will not tell you that. But I tell you that he made them probably because they were recommended by the chiefs of the several bureaus, and the Secretary, not possessing the necessary technical knowledge of the affairs of each of the bureaus, was unable to determine whether they were needed or not.

Mr. BOUTELLE. How is he going to determine it any better under the proposed system?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. He is going to have at the head of the construction bureaus men in whose judgment he can have confidence.

Mr. BOUTELLE. More than he has now?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. And he will have a council which will enable him to control the expenditures.

Mr. BOUTELLE (to Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois). You give away your case.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Not at all.

Mr. GOFF. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have already said, these are errors of administration, not of organization. The case cited by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] as well as the citations of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] show that there was an original error committed by the subordinate officers of the Department in recommending the purchase of certain articles, when, in fact, a sufficient supply was on hand. But what is to prevent the same error of judgment under this bill, that we are asked to vote for? Suppose the purchasing agent should be misinformed, as the Secretary was misinformed in the cases in question, would we not then have on hand a greater quantity of supplies than we needed? That would simply be a mistake of administration——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And if the purchasing agent, provided for under the pending bill, should buy more than was necessary for any particular bureau those supplies could not be transferred under this bill, could they?

Mr. GOFF. Not at all. Only articles purchased by appropriations made for the different bureaus can be used by those bureaus, as appropriations have been and, under the proposed bill, will be made.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then this bill would not cure the evil, would it? It would depend upon the estimates.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. It would not depend upon the estimates; it would depend upon the law.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Exactly; but as I understand, if a single purchasing agent should purchase, for instance, more for one bureau than was needed, he could not transfer it to another bureau.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Not at all.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. How will that evil be guarded against by the present bill?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Oh, they are going to have better men!

Mr. REED. No; we are going to have lump appropriations, instead of definite ones, thus returning to one of the evils which our recent appropriations have sought to correct.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. When it comes my turn to occupy the floor, I shall take pleasure in answering the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH].

Mr. E. B. TAYLOR. I hope the gentleman from West Virginia will be permitted to proceed without these interruptions. We are very desirous to hear his views.

Mr. GOFF. It is true these interruptions occupy time, but perhaps in a conversational way we can reach an understanding about the merits of the controversy better than in any other manner. I have no special objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I trust his time will be extended.

Mr. GOFF. I think my time has not expired.

Mr. HERBERT. By order of the House, an hour and a half was to be allowed to the opponents of the bill; and the gentleman from West Virginia, who controls that time, can, if he desires to do so, go on for half an hour more.

Mr. BOUTELLE (to Mr. HERBERT). I think you had better not limit the gentleman to half an hour, after occupying a third of the time yourself.

Mr. HERBERT. Oh, no; I did not. I have not interrupted the gentleman, and I hope nobody else will.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair was not informed of the arrangement which has been stated by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] controls the whole of the hour and a half allowed to that side.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the gentleman from West Virginia will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. GOFF. Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been urged, especially by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], and also by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], that there are evils in the organization of the Department, and that it should be reorganized for the reason that during the last twenty years the enormous sum of $76,000,000 has been expended, to use the language of the gentleman from Texas, in the construction, repair, and equipment of vessels; or, to use the language of the Secretary of the Navy, in his report, that $70,000,000 has been expended since 1868 in the construction, repair, and equipment of vessels; and it is urged that the system must be vicious when we take into consideration the fact that we have no vessels on the sea today.

The gentleman from Texas now speaks in favor of new ships—of a new navy. When I heard that argument from him I thought it would have been well for the country if it had been made here years ago by some one from his side of this House. When I read the report of the Secretary of the Navy it struck me that it was a singular document to be sent by the head of a great Department of a Democratic administration to a Democratic House of Representatives. It would have been much fairer if the Secretary and the gentleman from Texas had divided their amounts and said that $5,000,000 had been expended during these twenty-odd years in the construction of vessels, and $70,000,000 in their repair, equipment, and ordnance.

Why, sir, the argument which has been made on this side for the last twenty years when the naval appropriation bills have been under consideration has been that Congress should appropriate to the Navy Department the money which would enable its then organization to construct ships; and regularly did our friends on the other side of the House interpose not only objections, but their votes. Regularly did they adopt the estimates for repairs and strike out the estimates for construction. You want to hold the organization of a Department responsible for results in not constructing a navy, when you have uniformly for years, and when you had control of this House, refused to give that Department a dollar with which to build a navy. Now, as the result, we have no navy on the sea, and we are told by the very men who are responsible for this condition of affairs that we have no navy, because the Department of the Navy has not been properly conducted, and because the plan of organization adopted is a failure. A most singular argument in the face of the facts.

Now, when you say that $75,000,000 have been expended for construction, repair, equipment, and ordnance, it may be true; but if you want to know what amount has been expended for construction, throwing out of consideration the old vessels upon which you have forced these repairs, the amount will not reach $5,000,000. Yet the great Department of the Navy is held responsible for this result, when the Congress alone is to blame.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. What period of time does the gentleman cover in that statement?

Mr. GOFF. I am covering the period from 1868 down to 1881, because in 1881, when this side of the House recovered control here, it commenced, in fact and in earnest, the construction of a navy. It appropriated the first money for that purpose; it provided for the appointment of the first board to carry out that policy; it took measures for the rehabilitation of the Navy. But during all the years when my friends on the other side were in the majority in this House not a dollar was appropriated except for repairs or vessels commenced years before.

Why, when the effort was made to secure appropriations for construction the gentlemen on that side who had control of the appropriation bills invariably, in reporting their measures to the House, stated they had eliminated therefrom all matters for construction, and that they gave all that was necessary, to use the language of Mr. Hiester Clymer, of Pennsylvania, a distinguished citizen of that State, who was then a member of the House, they gave all that was necessary "for actual repair of the present vessels."

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Let me ask my friend, if, at that time, there were included in the estimates suggestions of necessity for appropriation for construction?

Mr. GOFF. Frequently, over and over again; and my friends on the other side, for a reason I suppose they had, and which we probably can surmise, have uniformly excluded it. They did not intend a Republican administration should build a navy, or should have the credit of placing new vessels of war upon the sea.

There was no complaint made then that the administration of the Department was defective on account of vicious organization. There was no complaint made then. We could not, under this law, build these vessels. There was an intimation we would not properly spend the money. The provisions of the law surrounded all appropriations; if they were not sufficient they should have been amended. In fact every dollar appropriated has been faithfully accounted for.

And now, I say, when my friends are not only in power on that side of the House, but also at the other end of the Avenue, and when this side of the House concedes the necessity of a Navy, and meets you more than half way, and joins hands joyfully in its construction when we are asking it, then we are told before a navy can be completed it is necessary to reorganize the "vicious department," so that when we have this navy dancing on the ocean wave and carrying our flag proudly over the seas to all ports, your side will rise up and say, Behold what we have done by virtue of the new law that we passed when we came into power!

Gentlemen, the change you make is a change only in name. You have the substance here yet. You strike down the Bureau of Engineering and build up the subdivision of engineering. You strike down the Bureau of Yards and Docks, but you are compelled to have your Secretary transfer its duties to another.

Mr. Chairman, this very bill that has been offered here perpetuating the bureau system of the Navy Department is the grandest eulogy that can be offered in behalf of our present organization, coming from the gentlemen it does. They have endeavored to tear down, they have endeavored to dethrone it; their President has called it a shabby ornament; their Secretary has told us it is vicious; and yet, after spending months of study and a long session of advisement and consultation, they present to the House as the result of their great efforts and long communing—what? They give us the old system over again. A rose by any other name will smell as sweet. There is no change, only in name. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, we are going to finish the Navy; we on this side are going to do it, and we can do it under our present bureau system. We will do it, not you; we are going back to the "House of our fathers," and the places that have known us will soon know us again forever; and we can complete the Navy under the system that our friends, the enemy, when they present this bill to us, say, in effect, can not be improved. [Applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I am very sure that if any member of this House could convince me that I am in error in my judgment in regard to the provisions of this bill, that gentleman is the gentleman from West Virginia who has just taken his seat, and my only embarrassment in this matter is that so cool and clear a head as he carries on his shoulders should come to a conclusion which is so much at variance with my own judgment and the conclusion at which I have arrived. I certainly did not anticipate that the gentleman would be so strong in his opposition to this measure.

This bill is the outgrowth of days and weeks of discussion in the Committee on Naval Affairs, and many of its features were not objected to; and, so far as I knew, at the time of its report to the House no objection whatever was made by a vote, although the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from West Virginia, I believe, reserved to themselves the right to object, and, if necessary, to present a minority report.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I must ask my colleague from Connecticut to permit me to state to him that he is mistaken.

Mr. BUCK. I am stating simply the facts.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask my colleague if it is not a fact that I am on record in the committee as offering amendment after amendment?

Mr. BUCK. I have not said anything to the contrary.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not wish to be placed in a wrong position. I ask if I did not offer amendments——

Mr. BUCK. I was not speaking of amendments, and I certainly do not wish to be interrupted in regard to a matter to which I am not alluding.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am asking you not to place me in a false position.

Mr. BUCK. I will say this in reply to the gentleman from Maine, that he did offer two or three amendments in regard to the officers.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And reserved the right to oppose the bill.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman was opposed to it, and will be through all eternity, for what I know.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I shall be.

Mr. BUCK. I only alluded to that to show my great surprise at the turn affairs have taken.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, it is important for us who are to give a vote upon this matter by-and-by to know what changes we have made in existing law. The old law provided for eight different bureaus. We have provided for a Bureau of Navigation. That bureau the old law provided for, and we do not disturb it.

We have provided for the professional Bureau of Ordnance, and that was a provision in the old law which is not disturbed. We have provided for the professional Bureau of Medicine and Surgery. That was in the old law, and we do not disturb it. Now the only two bureaus that we add to these are the bureaus of "Materials, Construction, and Repair," and the bureau of "Supplies and Accounts."

In all the argument which the gentleman from West Virginia made I have not heard him object to the last bureau, that of supplies and accounts. The bureau of supplies and accounts simply relates to the supplies of the Navy and the Navy Department and the accounts which result from the furnishing of such supplies. I will assume that no member of the House has, therefore, any objection to the creation of a bureau such as that. Mind you, we have now disposed of every bureau with the exception of two—materials, construction and repair, and supplies and accounts—and I have shown that so far as the bureau of supplies and accounts is concerned there is and can be no objection whatever to it. So that our controversy is reduced to a smaller point; and perhaps we may be better able to understand the issue by confining our attention alone to that point.

Mr. ROUTELLE. Do I understand you to say that no objection was made to the bureau of supplies and accounts?

Mr. BUCK. I have not heard of any.

Mr. BOUTELLE. We are not responsible, of course, for your failure to hear it.

Mr. BUCK. I say that in my judgment no man can reasonably object to it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then I wish to be put on record as unreasonably objecting to it.

Mr. BUCK. I assume then that the only controversy existing relates to the fourth bureau, that of material, construction, and repair.

In this bureau of material, construction, and repair several of the old bureaus have been consolidated; the Bureau of Yards and Docks is there, the Bureau of Steam Engineering is there, the Bureau of Equipment and Construction is there; but you will observe one thing, gentleman, that everything that has gone into that bureau relates to the one subject-matter, and one subject-matter only, and that is to the building of a ship. There is one simple thing to do in that bureau, and that is to build a ship; but, after it is built, if it becomes out of repair, then it is the duty of that bureau to repair it. The building and repairing of ships is the only thing the bureau can deal with, or has jurisdiction over, under this bill.

I wish to call the attention of the committee also to this point: whether there is a single business man on the floor of this House who would not so arrange his business that every part of it belonging to one subject should be under one head and one control? The vote cast for the present order of things is a vote against good business principles, is against simplicity in business, is against clearness in accounts, and against economy in administration.

The gentleman from West Virginia objected to doing away with the Bureau of Yards and Docks. The yards and docks are for the repair and building of ships, and that chief of bureau which has the control of the construction and repair of the ships should also have the control of the place where they are constructed or repaired. That is a sensible arrangement.

The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] seemed to think that because we dissolved the Bureau of Yards and Docks we were dissolving yards and docks themselves; and he went forward to show their cost, and alluded to the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] who spoke so well the other day in regard to yards and docks; and he almost carried me out of the line of my own thoughts and judgment by the eloquent words he used in appealing to the history and legislation and administration of the Republican party in regard to measures connected with the Navy. But I shall not permit him to lead me away by his eloquence.

I agree with the gentleman from West Virginia in what he has said as to the efforts of the Republican party to construct a navy and to repair the Navy, and as to its glorious history during the war and all through it under Gideon Welles, of old Hartford, and all the way down under the orders of the various Secretaries of the Navy, including the gentleman from West Virginia himself. The gentleman leads us away from the main issue. He carries us away on the tide of his eloquence.

It seems to me that the gentleman from West Virginia has mistaken the question here. It is a question of reducing this business of the Navy Department to simplicity and clearness, so that we may all be able to understand it; and I repeat here that there can be no controversy about any other bureau that we have provided for except this. In this bureau it is provided there shall be a division of steam engineering; and the gentleman calls that a bureau, and he is frightened about that professional bureau of steam engineering and fears somebody's head may be cut off. I say to this committee that from the drift of this debate, it has seemed to me that there was more of personal matters in the objections to the bill than there was of any real sensible argument against it. I know of nobody's head that is to come off. I have not, at all events, heard that anybody is to be displaced or removed, although I do not know but there may be. But I say this, that this bill provides for all that is necessary in regard to that bureau when it provides that the head of it shall be skilled in naval architecture.

If the gentleman from West Virginia will be better satisfied with putting in an amendment that the chief of the division of steam engineering shall be a good steam engineer I will vote for it with the greatest pleasure indeed. And if he is to assume in his argument that this chief of the bureau who is to be skilled in naval architecture would himself do an improper thing in the administration of the affairs of his bureau and appoint a man that has no knowlege of steam engineering, then I am perfectly willing, so far as my vote is concerned, to relieve him of his fears on that point and vote for an amendment that the person appointed shall be a steam engineer; but the gentleman's fears I think are groundless.

Further, I do not propose to stand here in my place to-day and admit for a single moment that the present administration has any credit at all for originating this measure. I do not concede that the present Secretary of the Navy is the originator of this scheme. He recommends what other Secretaries have recommended. For ten years we have labored to bring about this very result. Secretary after Secretary is on record in favor of a measure substantially like the one now under discussion. In 1877 the then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Thompson, issued an order under the provisions of the law of 1842, by which order the business of the Navy Department has been conducted substantially from that day to this.

The operations under that order in time became unsatisfactory, and in 1882, by a provision of Congress, the then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Chandler, appointed a commission to look into this matter. That committee consisted of Mr. Luce (now Commodore Luce, I believe), an officer of the line; Chief Engineer Loring, of the staff corps, and Mr. Mullett. Mr. Loring is the present efficient chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, than whom there is not a more able engineer in the United States, or, in my judgment, in the world. He was a member of the commission. That commission in June, 1883, said this:

> We recommend a reorganization and a concentration of the mechanical departments of every navy-yard, so that there shall be but one shop in each for the performance of the same class of work.

That is what this bill provides for, and that is all that the provisions of this bill can be tortured into doing, notwithstanding the eloquence of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. GOFF. Can not that reform be accomplished by an order of the Secretary?

Mr. BUCK. Not as well. That order of Secretary Thompson was made in 1877, and by 1882 it was violated and was working badly. It was alluded to in 1883 by Secretary Chandler, and the Secretaries from that time down to the present have endeavored to correct these evils that have been alluded to, by calling attention to them in their reports over and over again, and by issuing these orders. That, I say, has been done by every Secretary, including the gentleman from West Virginia himself [Mr. GOFF], who at one time held that office. Can argument go further than this?

Mr. GOFF. You have cited Chief Engineer Loring.

Mr. BUCK. I have cited Chief Engineer Loring.

Mr. GOFF. He was examined by the committee. His opinion was not asked as to this bill.

Mr. BUCK. Oh, I know he disapproves it now. If you merely want to ask me a question, I do not object to being interrupted, but if you want to read, I must object. I know that Chief Engineer Loring opposes this change now. I know he does not want it to-day; but I appeal from Mr. Loring of to-day to Mr. Loring of 1883. Mr. Loring of to-day is objecting to this bill, for what reason I will not undertake to say, but the Chief Engineer Loring of June, 1883, was either another man or else he has changed wonderfully in the interval if he objects to this measure now.

At that time he said:

We recommend a reorganization and a concentration of the mechanical departments of every navy-yard.

That is the language of Chief Engineer Loring of 1883, but the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] says that now, in 1887, Mr. Loring is opposed to this bill, although all it does, is to carry out substantially what he has recommended.

Mr. GOFF. Mr. Loring was in favor of the reorganization of the navy-yards. The gentleman from Connecticut should bear in mind the difference between the navy-yards and the Navy Department.

Mr. BUCK. Wait a moment, then, and I will satisfy you that he went even further.

Mr. GOFF. He recommended the consolidation of the yards, but the yards can be consolidated by the order of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BUCK. "Hold your horses" a moment, and I will show you that Mr. Loring went much further. In 1883, when the commission made this report, Mr. Chandler, then Secretary of the Navy, called attention to the fact that the expenses upon the Omaha, the Shenandoah, the Ossipee, the Mohican, and the Alert were enormously beyond what they ought to be. He called the attention of Constructor Wilson to that fact, and Mr. Wilson replied in an able letter which completely upset the then Secretary and discouraged him from any further attempt in that direction. He got around the matter, however, by extending another invitation in the fall of 1883 to the same gentlemen of the commission to give their opinion again, and then there came another opinion from the same commission, which will satisfy the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] on the point he has now raised. The gentleman from West Virginia suggests that Mr. Loring's recommendations related only to the navy-yards.

Mr. GOFF. I say that what you have quoted from Mr. Loring relates only to the reorganization of the navy-yards.

Mr. BUCK. I read now from this other report of Mr. Loring:

Hence we conclude that to organize our navy-yards on a just and permanent basis, to consolidate their several plants, to introduce thrift in the management and promptness in the methods of doing work with a proper system of accountability, to secure, in short, in each of your yards unification, method, economy, and dispatch, with an administration of its affairs agreeable to the principles of business as understood in civil life, it is absolutely necessary to begin with the Navy Department itself.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Now, will my colleague, in fairness to this House, read the concluding sentence of that report?

Mr. BUCK. You can read it yourself.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask you, as a matter of common fairness, to read it.

Mr. BUCK. You did not read this, so I have read it.

Now, let us see what Secretary Chandler says after he gets that letter from the commission and from Chief Engineer Loring. I am not attacking Chief Engineer Loring. I like him; I admire him; and woe be to the Secretary of the Navy that displaces him. But the gentleman from West Virginia undertakes to cite him and to convince me that I am in error when I say that Chief Engineer Loring was in favor of the reorganization of the Navy Department in 1883 whatever may be his position in 1886.

Mr. GOFF. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I said that this officer was not in favor of the mode of reorganization proposed by this bill.

Mr. BUCK. I know he is not; but I say that all that this bill proposes to do, substantially, is to unite the two Bureaus of Naval Construction and of Steam Engineering.

Mr. REED. Why do you not put in ordnance?

Mr. BUCK. Because the two bureaus I have named are similar in their functions. The steam engineering goes with the structure of a ship, while the manufacture of ordnance is a distinct profession and not necessarily connected with the building of the ship.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the question whether this or the preceding administration is entitled to credit for first suggesting this measure, I say it is the preceding administration.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Nobody on this side wants any credit for it.

Mr. BUCK. What does Secretary Chandler say in 1883 after that last letter?

Mr. BOUTELLE. That emphasizes my statement.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman keeps interrupting me. If he has any question to put to me directly I will try to reply to him. Secretary Chandler says:

The true solution of the conflict is to unite these two bureaus as a single bureau of naval construction, having for its chief the most competent naval architect that can be found, whether among the present officers of the Navy or in civil life.

He was not satisfied with this recommendation. He continued to work at the question another year; and in 1884 he again talks magnificently on this question, but in an entirely different strain from the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. GOFF. Not at all, sir; you will find that he makes the very point that I did about the destruction of the staff corps of the Navy.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman from West Virginia and I do not understand the language alike. I am, perhaps, unfortunate in not understanding its proper construction. Secretary Chandler, in 1884, says:

It is again recommended that the Bureaus of Construction and Repair and Steam Engineering be united as a single bureau of naval construction, to have for its chief the most competent naval architect that can be found——

Mr. GOFF. That is what I said.

Mr. BUCK continuing to read:

whether among the present officers of the Navy or in civil life.

Furthermore he says:

The Secretary, the chief constructor, the engineer-in-chief, the Chiefs of the Ordnance and Equipment Bureaus, and the officers of the board—twelve persons in all—have managed to agree fairly well concerning the designs and the work upon the new cruisers; but this extreme distribution of functions will not answer as a permanent organization.

That is the opinion of Secretary Chandler as to the present law.

I agree on this question with Secretary Chandler. I think he was right; and this bill, with the exception of the provision for the bureau of supplies and accounts, is identical with his recommendation in 1883 and 1884, and the commission report of Chief Engineer Loring.

I will not permit the gentleman from West Virginia to drive me away from my base by telling me that this measure belongs particularly to the present administration, and which, if it becomes a law, will glorify that administration. I do not begrudge this administration a single laurel that it has won for itself, or may win, by helping to build up the United States Navy as we have pleaded and begged for its building up for years since the war closed, or building up the United States Army, which ought to be increased.

Let this administration have all the glory that it can get from doing right. As to the evils of the present organization I will not stop to enumerate them; they are too numerous. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] has suggested that under this bill supplies can not be transferred from one bureau to another; and the gentleman from West Virginia asked me whether an order from the Secretary of the Navy providing for this reorganization would not do as well as a law. Not at all. An order from the Secretary of the Navy may be given at one time and may subsequently be set aside or modified. Secretary Thompson gave his order in 1877, which was set aside or modified in 1884, in 1886, and still further in 1887 by Mr. Secretary Whitney. Each succeeding Secretary may have a different idea on this question. Secretary after Secretary may add order upon order; these orders may be piled up like Pelion upon Ossa, and, at last, we shall have only a mass of Secretaries' orders instead of a positive law.

I do not suppose that all these evils can be remedied by this bill. We must assume something in regard to the honesty of men in the administration of affairs. We must assume that this Chief of the Bureau of Material, Construction, and Repair will appoint competent men for his division officers. It must not be assumed that he will appoint incompetent men. There are piled up to-day in all the yards of the United States forty-six thousand augers and bits, twenty-five thousand of which are in yards which are not in use at all; yet these remain there as if hermetrically sealed, and can not, as the law exists, be transferred from one bureau to another.

What is the case in another navy-yard? I will not mention its name, but some may know what yard it is when I say they undertook to get some cut nails for the construction department in that yard and found that the construction department had not a cut nail, but that in the Bureau of Steam Engineering the floors were piled up with barrels upon barrels of cut nails; so that when the superintendent in charge of it inquired as to how long these cut nails would last that Bureau of Steam Engineering he answered, "Well, sir, about fifty years." [Laughter.] Think of it! Fifty years' stock of cut nails in one bureau, and not a cut nail in the bureau right alongside of it, and no power to transfer one cut nail from where there were too many, to the bureau where there was not one and where they were so much needed. [Renewed laughter.]

Will you follow the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to perpetuate such a system as this or will you vote for this bill which will simplify the law and make it plain and so administer it that these subjects, which relate to one particular matter, such as the building of ships, shall be under one bureau with one head? Or will you leave the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery under one head, or the Bureau of Navigation under one head, or the Bureau of Ordnance under one head, and yet take the construction of a ship, the most important of all to our prosperity and national defense, and distribute the construction of that work among three or four bureaus, each one having its own particular views as to how accounts should be kept, and each one having its own cash account, each one having its own system?

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCK. Certainly.

Mr. BAYNE. If this bill becomes a law, does the gentleman think it will remedy a difficulty like that which he has mentioned?

Mr. BUCK. Certainly I think it will, because it takes those subjects which relate to one particular matter and puts them all under the head and control of one man, thereby simplifying them. If you simplify a matter of business you make it easier to carry it on. If you take the Bureau of Steam engineering and put it by itself, and the Bureau of Construction by itself, and you go to work to build a ship you will find this state of things: The man who is in charge of the construction runs around to the man in charge of steam engineering and asks "how long is your engine going to be?" and he answers "I do not know; how long is your ship going to be? And so they go back and forth from one to the other.

There was evidence before the committee that in one instance in the construction of an engine there was a mistake in some part of the engine or shafting, so that it would not fit into the ship for which it was designed. [Laughter.] It was constructed in another bureau and under a different system, and that is the reason why they could not fit it.

I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that is the reason why, I think, this bill will remedy that difficulty; so that we will not have an excessive stock of cut nails in one bureau and not a single cut nail in another. [Laughter.]

But I do not care to discuss this question further. I should not have spent the time I have taken up had it not been that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] had so led me away in admiration of his eloquence that I had almost forgotten my old-fashioned judgment of the bill, and was inclined to run after him. He had so many flags and feathers flying in favor of the action of the Republican party that I had almost forgotten the measure which my judgment approved.

But I now come back to my base. I come back to my own judgment. It is said sometimes that a "no" vote is always a safe vote for a man in the minority. But I tell you, gentlemen, the day will come when "no" votes will be out of fashion where they are not right. The day is not far distant when "no" votes in this House must be based on an intelligent understanding of the merits of the matters which they relate to. They are not to be indulged in merely because they are asked for by members who may choose to carry chips on their shoulders, while all the while they have politics in their eyes. [Laughter and applause.] It will not do for them to say they have discovered mares' nests, or to sound the party slogan, and cry out they must be followed in the course they choose to take. [Renewed laughter and applause.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. May I ask the gentleman from Connecticut a question?

Mr. BUCK. Certainly.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand that this bill has been recommended over and over again and persistently by Republican Secretaries of the Navy. Am I correct?

Mr. BUCK. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And the recommendations and orders have been disregarded by a Democratic House?

Mr. BUCK. I do not know about a Democratic House disregarding the orders of a Republican Secretary of the Navy——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not mean orders. I mean recommendations.

Mr. BUCK. Well, I agree with the gentleman that a Democratic House is about as bad as you can call it [laughter] to build up anything to defend the country either on the sea or its coasts or elsewhere. But when you tell me that a Democratic House can change an order of the Secretary of the Navy, I tell you they can not do it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But as soon as a Democratic Secretary of the Navy, following in the wake and example of a Republican Secretary of the Navy, recommends the same thing our Democratic brethren give their assent.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. That is about the size of it.

Mr. BUCK. I might add this, that after our Republican Secretaries of the Navy, in 1883 and 1884 and for years, have recommended this precise change, yet when we come here where a Democratic Secretary of the Navy recommends it to be done, the gentleman from West Virginia and the gentleman from Maine say we must not do it now, and change position and go just the other way.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. When they follow our lead they are usually safe. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. They do not flop with us now; that is all.

Mr. BUCK. It is only a question of flopping one way or the other, as the gentleman says. These gentlemen seem to be in favor of our flopping because a Democratic side of the House has flopped.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Connecticut a question before he takes his seat. Will the gentleman permit me to do so?

Mr. BUCK. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not suppose the gentleman really desires to place anybody in a false position——

Mr. BUCK. Ask your question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wish to ask whether you have any foundation for asserting or intimating that "the gentleman from West Virginia and the gentleman from Maine" have at any time or anywhere ever favored any such measure as this, destroying as it does the functional organization of the Navy Department, though recommended by a Republican Secretary of the Navy, and now change front and face the other way because a Democratic Secretary of the Navy is in control.

Mr. BUCK. I never made such an intimation; you are opposed to it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am glad the gentleman gives me his categorical denial.

Mr. BUCK. You were opposed to it yesterday, you are opposed to-day, and will be opposed to-morrow, and everlastingly as long as a Democratic Secretary of the Navy is in power. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am opposed to it, and have been all along.

Mr. BUCK. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, owing to my present physical condition, suffering as I am from a terribly sore throat, I shall not be able to speak at any great length concerning this measure. I will therefore cut my remarks very short and allude to only a few of the principal points which occur to me in considering the bill. Much that I had thought of saying has been anticipated by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK], as well as by the gentleman from Texas, Governor SAYERS. I had intended to try to disabuse the mind of the members of the House of the idea that this was a Democratic measure. That, it seems to me, has been effectually done by those who have preceded me.

I remember distinctly that Secretary Hunt, in his day, called attention to the unhappy condition of affairs growing out of the present bureau system in the Navy Department, and urged with all his power that some change be made which would prevent wasteful expenditures of the public money. I remember that Secretary Chandler, following after him, urged in his peculiarly nervous language and forcible manner the same thing. I call attention to one extract only from the annual report of Secretary Chandler for 1884, showing the position occupied by him on this question. He says:

The next defect is of the same character as that which exists in the organization of the Navy Department itself, namely, the subdivision of the direction of work upon vessels among the naval constructor, the chief engineer, and the equipment officer—all three engaged upon one vessel, all having co-ordinate powers, and none of them under any control on the spot except that of the line officer of high rank who commands the naval station. Under these circumstances unity of action and effective direction and superintendence of the building or repairing of a ship are impossible.

The remedy for these defects must be found in placing one technical head—a competent ship-builder—over all the persons engaged in building or repairing the ship; over the work on the hull, the machinery, and the equipment. The difficulty of finding within or without the naval corps persons fit for the service required, and of placing them in their appropriate positions in the naval establishment, is recognized. But they must be found, if the Government workshops are to be worthy of the name. When found and installed, they must be made in all technical matters practically independent of the commander of the naval station.

I read this to show that in the navy-yards, which are but subdivisions of the Navy Department, this consolidation was recommended by Secretary Chandler. Why there should be three separate heads in the mechanical and construction departments of a ship is beyond my comprehension, knowing as I do that there has been too often a lack of harmony between the Construction, the Steam-Engineering, and the Equipment Bureaus. The purpose of this bill is to put them all under one head, so that the supplies which may be purchased by the different bureaus may be used wherever needed, instead of being hoarded up in this navy-yard or that, as is done under the present system. Common sense dictates that all supplies should be under the control of one head, and should be used either for steam engineering, or for construction, or for equipment as occasion requires.

I call attention to a few of the articles of property which have accumulated in the different bureaus, which shows the wastefulness of the present system. It is claimed by the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] that these are matters of maladministration rather than of a vicious system. That may be true, or it may not. But the bureaus, like the court of chancery of England, have each striven with might and main to aggrandize their powers, to get all they can and keep all they get, each striving to be an independent little navy department of itself.

Thus we find in the different navy-yards the following property which can not be used outside of the particular bureau under which it was purchased: Augers and bits to the number of 46,860; paint brushes, 11,813; files, 146,385; screws, 29,542 gross. We have in another bureau, that of provisions and clothing, pea-jackets, which have been piling up and up, from year to year, until we have on hand enough to last for fifty years. And yet year after year purchases have been made of the articles.

Shall we, because there happens to be a Democratic administration, continue to tolerate this evil? Shall we stand here and oppose this reform when we have condemned the system ourselves—when officers of the same party with ourselves have said it is wrong? Now that the Democrats have at last come to their senses and propose to do a right thing, shall we under those circumstances stand here and object to it? I think not.

There are some objections to this bill which I would have urged when it was considered in the Committee on Naval Affairs had I been present; but not being able to be present I could not present them, and I will now exercise the inherent right of a member and point out those objections. It has been urged that this bill grows out of a fight between the line and the staff. I think that objection can be obviated by a very slight amendment. I shall offer to the second section of this bill a provision which will make it read as follows:

That the chief of the bureau of material, construction, and repair may be appointed from civil life or from the active-list of officers of the line or staff of the Navy, who shall be skilled naval constructors and architects.

I am opposed to putting a man at the head of this bureau who is not a skilled naval constructor and architect. It has been urged in private conversation and elsewhere that one of the most efficient executive officers we ever had in the Navy Department was ex-Assistant Secretary Fox; that he understood the ins and outs of all the different systems, and that during the war of the rebellion he exercised almost imperial power. That is true, and in time of war he was one of the most effective officers that ever presided over the Department. But he presided over the personnel of the Navy and not over its construction. We must have a naval constructor, one who has the necessary technical knowledge; who is master, in other words, of the profession of naval architecture and of naval construction, that he may properly and efficiently administer that branch of the Navy Department.

Then in section 3 of the bill I shall offer the same amendment, so as to put the line and staff upon the same footing. It has been urged that "an officer on the active list of the Navy" means a line officer; as the staff officers have only relative rank it has been claimed that they are not really officers. Therefore it has been urged, and plausibly, too, that this is in the interest of the line officers. I am opposed to that idea and to that construction of the bill. I think the best man should be selected without reference to whether he belongs to the line or the staff. Therefore I put it "the line or the staff." We want to have that objection to the bill removed.

Mr. McKENNA. That does not take it out.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. We can not have both line and staff.

Mr. McKENNA. We can have one or the other, according as they fit the position.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. True; and that is what I am trying to provide for. With these amendments I shall support the bill. I think this is a move in the right direction, and that it ought to be taken, and taken at once.

If time and health would permit I could go on and cite so many instances of maladministration, as General GOFF calls it, or wasteful extravagance, if you prefer that term, for either one will apply properly to the wrongs and outrages perpetrated and practiced under the present system—that all with one accord would condemn the existing organization of the Navy Department. But it is not necessary to do that. There have been and are wrongs, and we have the opportunity here of righting them; and we ought to do it without regard to whether we have a Democratic President and a Democratic Secretary of the Navy or not.

It has been suggested here that the Democratic party did everything on earth it could to keep us from building ships. That is true. The first ships authorized since the war were authorized by a Republican Congress.

It authorized the construction of the Boston, the Atlanta, the Chicago, and the Dolphin; and at the same time, recognizing the viciousness of the existing system, authorized the appointment of a naval advisory board to superintend the building of those vessels and the expenditure of the money. That same Republican Congress expressly took the expenditure of that money out of the hands of the bureaus in order that it might be done economically and intelligently. The best possible results have not been realized, it is true, and yet they are the best ships that this country has ever built. Now, when the existing system is found fault with by the Democrats for the first time, I want my Republican friends to remember that a Republican Congress found the same fault with it long ago. There is no politics in this measure. All this talk about its being a political scheme appears to me to be without any foundation whatever. It is a move in the interest of an honest and intelligent management of a great department of the Government; a move in the interest of economical and wise administration. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE].

Mr. WISE. I am very much obliged to the gentleman, but I do not desire to speak now.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Then I yield the time to the chairman of the committee [Mr. HERBERT].

Mr. HERBERT. I will reserve my time, Mr. Chairman, until after the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] has concluded.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman from West Virginia, I understood, yielded a portion of his time to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LORE].

Mr. HERBERT. Does the gentleman from Delaware wish to speak?

Mr. LORE. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Eighteen minutes remain to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. LORE. Mr. Chairman, I regret to say that I am not in sympathy with the majority of the committee in the advocacy of this bill. Whenever any effort is to be made to apply a remedy it seems to me that the first thing to do is to seek to know the evils that are to be remedied. I have listened to what has been said on the subject of reorganization of the Navy Department on this floor. I heard and have tried carefully to analyze the testimony that was produced before the committee to show the evils that exist in the Navy Department, the material portions of which have been read in the hearing of this committee, and I think it will not be disputed by any member of the committee, that the testimony shows those evils to be simply the accumulation of large quantities of stores in the different Government depositories belonging to the Navy Department, and the duplication of machine shops and other works in the navy-yards.

If these are the evils, then there is only one feature of this bill which applies to them, the feature in relation to the purchase and distribution of supplies. And I think this committee will bear me out in saying not only that there is power in the Secretary of the Navy under existing law to correct them, but that he in fact is correcting them to-day. He has provided a system by which all purchases are to be made, and by which all purchases when made are to be distributed to the respective bureaus. That power is in the Secretary to-day; the present Secretary is putting it in actual operation, and Secretary Chandler recognized the fact of its existence when he issued an order to Chief Constructor Wilson, commanding him to make the necessary changes in the respective yards. In that case Commander Wilson in his reply conceded the power of the Secretary of the Navy, and simply gave reasons why what the Secretary desired should not be done. Those reasons were satisfactory to Secretary Chandler, and he did not enforce the order, not, however, from lack of power to do so.

Under that order of the Secretary, and under the admission of the chief constructor, then, and under the actual operation and working of the Department at this time, that power is admitted to exist. If that be so, then the existence of these evils becomes simply a question of maladministration. What is the remedy? Why, sir, there is a remedy to-day. It is not to change but to enforce the law and exercise the power now possessed. The accumulation of these stores, probably, has grown out of the fact that during the last twenty to twenty-five years there has been an enormous increase in the amount of supplies needed in the Navy and an enormous draft upon the Navy. In short, this accumulation of surplus stores is an outgrowth of the great war through which we have passed, and because the purchase of them was not properly watched.

Under the system now adopted by the Secretary of the Navy all supplies will be purchased through one agency and distributed through one agency, and there will be no difficulty whatever in getting them just when they are wanted, and there will be no unnecessary accumulation. Therefore the existing law is sufficient for the remedy of these evils. However, if the bill for the reconstruction of the Navy Department stopped there I should have no hesitancy in supporting it. But it does not stop there. It takes hold of a system which has grown up during the last forty-four years. That system has grown up under Whig, under Democratic, and under Republican administrations. It has crystallized under the logic of necessity and of fact. Secretary Whitney, in his report to the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, gave the following history of the transitions in the Navy Department organization:

Historically it is a fact that up to the time that the present bureau system was created, in 1842, and for some time thereafter, the American Navy, though inferior in numbers to the navies of some other countries, was as formidable as any for its tonnage, and seems to have contributed to, and appropriated improvements in, the art of naval warfare as largely and as rapidly as any other naval power.

During the thirty years between the close of the war of 1812 and the commencement of the Mexican war, our naval force increased fifty-fold and the navies of no other power were superior to it except in the number of their vessels. "As respects the navies of this hemisphere, it was supreme, the united marines of all the rest of this continent being unable to contend against it for an hour." (Cooper's Naval History: Preface.)

Prior to 1842 the business of the Department had been managed by a board of naval commissioners, and the result of my reading leads me to the conclusion that while the affairs of the Department were intelligently administered so far as the general scope of the conduct of its affairs was concerned, yet the system failed in executive force.

In 1839 Congress called upon the Secretary of the Navy by resolution to propose a plan of reorganization, embracing "a division of the duties performed by the board of naval commissioners and their assignment to separate bureaus." In compliance with this resolution the Secretary reported in December, 1839, a system, and in 1842 bureaus with independent heads were first established. It was quite evident that with the application of steam to naval vessels a new problem, and one which has been greatly multiplied since by the constant progress of arts, had been brought to the Department for solution. The Secretary says:

"Should the introduction of steam as an auxiliary to naval warfare be sanctioned by the results of experience, it must be obvious that new and very important duties will devolve on the Secretary of the Navy, rendering the aid of professional science and experience still more indispensable in the administration of the Department."

Up to that time a naval commission, composed of naval officers without responsible executive heads subordinate to them, had resulted for a long time satisfactorily, but finally had failed with the accumulation of labor and with the problems which science had thrown upon the Department.

History discloses the fact, therefore, that no political party can justly claim credit for the present organization of the Navy Department, and the question is in nowise a party question. A Democratic Congress in 1839 by a resolution called upon James K. Paulding, the then Democratic Secretary of the Navy, for a plan of organization; the Secretary reported the present bureau system, which, in 1842, under the then Secretary of the Navy, Abel P. Upshur, was put into operation, and constituted the frame-work of our present system. From that time until the present, under the administrations of Presidents Tyler, Polk, Taylor, Fillmore, Pierce, Buchanan, Lincoln, Johnson, Grant, Hayes, Garfield, and Arthur, embracing every shade of political opinion, this system has been enlarged and perfected by the wisdom and experience of these successive administrations as the necessities of our national life demanded. It has the additional recommendation of having been tested and approved by one of the most gigantic wars ever waged in human annals.

Well may it be said, therefore, that it is the outgrowth of the wisdom and experience of all these years; the child of no political party, but a system inherited by us from the statesmen, and not the politicians, of the past.

This system was ably urged upon Congress in 1841 by Matthew F. Maury, who was one of the most distinguished of all the officers who have graced the American Navy, and his articles in the Southern Literary Messenger for that year are acknowledged to have been comprehensive and exhaustive treatises on that subject. It seems to me, therefore, in the light of the foregoing history, that there is a lack of statesmanship in the effort apparently made by some members to drag this subject down into the turgid pool of politics. We should therefore hesitate to take that structure thus built up, tested by experience, although it be blotted here and there by occasional excess—we should hesitate to take that structure and "at one fell swoop" strike it out of existence, and venture at once upon the broad sea of experiment.

I beg this committee to remember for a moment and say whether there has been adduced here, in behalf of this measure, any other argument than simply this accumulation of stores and duplication of plants. If that can be remedied by the Secretary—if he is doing it now—why make this radical, sweeping change in the whole organization of the system?

It is said—and I regret exceedingly that my friend from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK], who is usually so fair, did not give us the whole report of Engineer-in-Chief Loring—it is said that Mr. Loring recommended this reconstruction of the Navy Department. Permit me to say that he did no such thing. He did advocate the removal of administrative abuses in the system. He did, in speaking of the navy-yards, say that the reform must begin with the Navy Department; that is, that the Secretary of the Navy himself must make the order which would reform the evil. In fairness, why not state in full what Mr. Loring did say? His position to-day is consistent with his position at that time. I am not his defender. It is only justice to him to say that he does not occupy any different position to-day from what he did then. At the end of that report he says that the consummation of the desirable end of which he speaks need not necessarily change the general character of the organization of the Department. Mr. Loring and those who joined him in making that report (Rear Admiral Luce and Mr. Mullett) say that the reforms to be worked out in the navy-yards do not involve a change in the structure of the Navy Department. Yet, my friend from Connecticut would have you believe that those officers advocated a change in the structure of that Department.

My objection goes farther than this point. I can not recognize this proposed change as one conducive to economy. It is advocated upon that ground. But do you economize by abolishing eight bureaus and practically substituting nine? for that is the effect of this bill. Do you economize by adding to the Navy Department new officers as heads of bureaus or divisions, whose pay will amount to more than $8,000? for, as I understand upon a careful computation, the additional force provided for in this bill will involve an expense of about $8,500. This is not legislation in the line of economy.

Again, it is urged that this change will enable us to fix responsibility. This claim, it seems to me, is not sustained by an examination of the provisions of the bill. How does it tend to fix responsibility? Under the present system there are eight heads of bureaus, responsible directly to their chief, the Secretary of the Navy. By this bill you propose to abolish four of these bureaus; and you propose to place between the Secretary of the Navy and the great divisions of Construction and Steam Engineering—the two greatest divisions in your Navy—some intermediary; so that whenever the head of one of these divisions, skilled in his department, wants to communicate with the Secretary of the Navy, he must do it through an intermediate officer. You remove from the Secretary of the Navy by one additional step the skilled men who should be in immediate contact with him. You divide responsibility while you concentrate power. You put it within the power of the officer who is to preside over that bureau to remove at will the skilled engineer, or skilled constructor, a man whose whole life, perhaps, has been spent in acquiring peculiar fitness for his duty. And the officer who is to exercise this power may be a mere politician—a mere figurehead. I assume that he certainly can not be skilled in the business of both these departments; for I need not say to this intelligent body that a man, to become a thoroughly skilled engineer, or a thoroughly skilled constructor of hulls, must devote his whole life to his specialty. Between the Secretary of the Navy and these skilled men, who should have immediate and direct communication with their chief, you interpose—whom? A man through whom everything must be filtered before it can reach the ear of the Secretary.

Can it be said that the man who will thus be placed over these two great divisions will be thoroughly skilled in both steam engineering and in construction? Such a man does not exist!

If the intermediary have a smattering of both of these professions the link between the skilled head of division and the Secretary of the Navy would be incompetent to fairly transmit the needed intelligence. If he be skilled in one and not in the other branch the medium in the unskilled branch will be alike defective. In either case a premium would be placed upon incompetency; and ignorance, not intelligence, would be placed next to power. You diffuse and scatter responsibility while you concentrate power.

I do not know that I can present this more clearly than I have done; but let me illustrate how, in my view, instead of enabling the Secretary of the Navy to locate responsibility, you divide it. Suppose that, in a vessel which is being built, there is some mistake in regard to the adaptation of the engine and the vessel to each other. There are now but two men who can be responsible—either the steam engineer or the constructor. Suppose you have, between them and the Secretary of the Navy, an intermediate officer, then you will have three officers among whom the responsibility for the mistake will be divided.

I submit to this committee, that the proposed change, instead of making our vessels more perfect and beautiful, will make it more difficult to secure their construction than is the case now.

Again, the theory of the bill is not perfect. If a ship of war is worth anything she must be adapted, not simply the engine to the hull, and the hull to the engine, but her ordnance must be fitted and adapted to both hull and engine. Yet you keep the Ordnance Bureau separate and distinct. If you wish to carry out your hypothesis and put the construction of a war-vessel under one great, strong, controlling mind, why was an exception made in the case of the Ordnance Bureau?

But I can conceive of no such directing and controlling mind, skilled in all branches of knowledge for the perfection and harmony of the construction of hull, engine, and boilers, unless it be the Almighty himself; for there is no one upon the face of the green earth who at the same time is perfectly skilled in ordnance and in the construction of the hull and the building of the engine, and in every other matter. Such a man—skilled in all these branches—does not exist, and never will. If, therefore, your theory be worth anything, there should be no exception to it in case of the Ordnance Department; but on the contrary, you must have the engine and boilers, the hull, the ordnance, all provided for and harmonized and constructed under the control and by the direction of one man, so that when the vessel shall be constructed and launched upon the ocean it will be perfectly fitted and adapted for the purposes of offense and defense.

Now, Mr. Chairman, under your present system, before one single stroke of work is done or any action is taken in reference to the construction of a war vessel, plans and specifications have to be carefully prepared, and when those plans and specifications have been approved, after a most careful examination, they are then placed in the hands of the respective officers for the execution of the details of the work. They are put in the engineering shops for the purpose of constructing the engine precisely according to the plans and specifications, which have been furnished. The construction of the hull and its adaptation in every respect to the engine and the ordnance is placed in the hands of the constructor, and he is bound to follow carefully the plans and specifications which are before him. If there be any defect anywhere, if the work be not done in accordance with the plans and specifications, the responsibility for that defect can be located and placed upon the party who is guilty of it.

If it be the purpose to place all these departments under one man, then, so far as that control is concerned, you have in this bill left out the ordnance, which is an integral part of the complete war vessel; indeed the unit of power, and is also the primal consideration with the architect in designing the hull.

This committee can not place too great weight upon the consideration that to-day more depends upon the engineer who puts into the ship the engine which inspires it with throbbing and active life, and which drives her with Titanic force, and with almost lightning speed, across the seas. For the last fifty years the lines of beauty in the construction of our vessels have changed but little. To-day we have advanced not far from the Clipper model, which sailed from out the port of Baltimore and became, at once, the mistress of the ocean. To-day, in the matter of hulls, we are but little in advance of the men, who, upon our northern coast, sent out vessels remarkable for their beauty, speed, and power.

But, to-day, the important man is the one who puts in the vessel the engine which drives it through the ocean; that machine whose intricate delicacy and marvelous power are the wonder of the world, and which in war is to carry our ordnance which will reach with destructive power the enemy's vessels at the distance of many miles. Yet the bill abolishes, to my mind, this, the most important of all the bureaus, and degrades it to a division, in charge, it is true, of a skilled engineer and a skilled constructor, who are removable at the discretion of an unskilled intermediary. It degrades a large and honorable corps and takes away the stimulus of all possible recognition or reward for merit and service. Indeed, it is turning back the finger of progress on the dial of time, and is experimenting hypothetically in the face of past experience.

The Bureau of Steam Engineering was not accidental in its creation.

It was the outgrowth of necessity molding the highest intelligence' In 1862 John Lenthall, who was then the Chief of the Bureau of Construction, and acknowledged to be one of the most able and accomplished constructors who ever lived, insisted that the steam-engineering department, which was at that time part of the Bureau of Construction, should constitute a distinct bureau.

This bill proposes again to consolidate these bureaus, to ignore the experience of the past which demonstrated the necessity of separation: that, too, in the face of the fact that steam engineering was then in its infancy and steam war-vessels were few, while now it constitutes the great arm of the service.

For these and many other reasons that I have not time now to elaborate, I am constrained to oppose this bill. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. McMILLIN. Let me interrupt the gentleman from Alabama to ask, in view of the fact that it is hardly possible this bill can be completed to-night, whether it will be agreeable to him to yield to a motion that this committee now rise?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let us go on with the bill, and save time.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It can not be passed in its present form. The chairman has himself admitted the necessity of amendments.

Mr. HERBERT. I have talked with a number of gentlemen who are opposed to the bill and think it will be impossible to get through with it to-night. I therefore yield for that motion.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill to consolidate certain bureaus of the Department of the Navy, had come to no resolution thereon.

REGENT SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. SINGLETON. I ask unanimous consent to report back a Senate joint resolution which simply provides for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. It has already passed the Senate, and meets the indorsement of the Committee on the Library. I ask that it be put upon its passage.

I will state that they have a meeting next Wednesday, and it is important the vacancy on the board should be filled before that time.

The SPEAKER. The title of the joint resolution will be read subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 90) appointing James B. Angell a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

There being no objection, the Senate joint resolution was read by its title a third time, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to adjourn, the Chair, if there be no objection, will submit a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (H. R. 1034) for the relief of Bangs, Brownell & Company;

A bill (H. R. 1877) for the relief of John McNaughton.

INDEBTEDNESS OF PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield to me for a moment for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an amendment which I propose to offer to the bill (H. R. 8318) in relation to the Pacific railroads.

Mr. McMILLIN. I yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send the amendment to the desk.

The amendment proposed by Mr. SPRINGER is as follows:

Amend House bill No. 8318 by striking out of section 1 all after line 16 to the end of said section, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"PARAGRAPH A. The companies aforesaid shall, respectively, on the 1st day of October, 1887, and semi-annually thereafter, pay into the Treasury of the United States a sum equal to the amount which the United States is required to pay semi-annually as interest on the subsidy bonds advanced to each of said companies, respectively, in aid of the Pacific railroads and branches, until the date of the maturity of said bonds, respectively, less the amount of any payments or reimbursements made by any of said companies, respectively, during the six months previous to any such payment upon their indebtedness under any act of Congress heretofore passed.

"PARAGRAPH B. At the respective dates of the maturity of said subsidy bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury shall add to the sum of the principal of such matured bonds all the interest paid by the United States upon the same. From said amounts, so ascertained, shall be deducted any payments or reimbursements made by any of said companies upon their indebtedness at any time before the 1st day of October, 1887, and also the amounts in the sinking fund properly applicable to the respective companies (computing the value of any bonds in such sinking fund at their market value at a day to be agreed upon by the presidents of the companies interested therein and the Secretary of the Treasury), and simple interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum upon said amounts in the sinking fund from such day agreed upon until the average date of the maturity of the subsidy bonds.

"PARAGRAPH C. Upon the sum of the principal of said subsidy bonds remaining due and unpaid at the respective dates of the maturity thereof, the said companies shall pay into the Treasury of the United States interest thereon at a rate which shall equal but shall not exceed the rate of interest at which the bonds of the United States, issued in aid of said companies, can be extended; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to extend the same not exceeding ten years from the respective dates of their maturity and at the lowest rate of interest at which such bonds can be extended at par for that time.

"PARAGRAPH D. Upon the sum of the interest upon said subsidy bonds remaining due and unpaid by the said companies at the respective dates of the maturity of said subsidy bonds, the said companies shall pay into the Treasury of the United States interest at the rate of 4 per centum per annun, payable semi-annually on the first day of October and the first day of April of each year during such time as the principal of said bonds shall be extended as herein provided.

"PARAGRAPH E. It is further provided that the said companies respectively may extend the liens of the first mortgage bonds, now issued by the respective companies, for the further term of ten years after the respective dates of the maturity thereof, but at no higher or greater rate of interest than 4 per centum per annum, upon this further condition, that the difference between the rate now paid by said companies upon said first mortgage bonds and that of 4 per centum per annum shall be applied exclusively to liquidate the principal of the indebtedness of said companies to the United States.

"PARAGRAPH F. At the time to which the payments of the said subsidy bonds shall be extended, as herein provided, the said companies are respectively authorized to issue bonds, secured by mortgages on their franchises and property, to an amount equal to their indebtedness to the United States and to their indebtedness secured by prior liens to that of the United States, but such new bonds shall not become prior liens until the extinguishment of the indebtedness of said companies, respectively, to the United States. And if, at the date to which the last issue of said subsidy bonds was extended, said companies shall have complied with the provisions of this act, and shall continue thereafter to pay into the Treasury of the United States semi-annually an amount equal to the interest upon such extended bonds, and 4 per centum upon the amount of such interest indebtedness still due and payable, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to allow one year to said companies thereafter, in which to complete the payments of the whole amount of principal and interest due the United States under this act and all acts of Congress relating to said railroad companies.

"PARAGRAPH G. In making payments under the provisions of this act and the acts to which this is an amendment, the Central Pacific Railroad Company and its successors shall pay into the Treasury of the United States, when the same shall become due and payable as aforesaid, the installments of the indebtedness of itself and the Western Pacific Railroad Company; the Union Pacific Railroad Company (successor to the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company) and its successors shall pay those of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and the Kansas and Pacific Railroad Company; the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company and its successors shall pay those of itself; and the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company and its successors those of itself."

Mr. SPRINGER. The time to which it is proposed to extend the indebtedness of the Pacific roads in my amendment is 1907—the time when $737,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds of the United States are due and payable.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the proposed amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection. The amendment is printed above.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent also to have printed in the RECORD an amendment which I propose to offer to the same bill.

There was no objection.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

Add as an additional section:

SEC. —. Nothing in this act shall be construed as sanctioning or confirming the consolidation of the Union Pacific Railroad Company with the Kansas Pacific Railway Company and the Denver Pacific Railroad Company and the transferring of their franchises and property to a corporation known as the Union Pacific Railway Company; but the legal status of all of the companies mentioned in this act shall be and remain as heretofore, except as herein expressly provided.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. There are several gentlemen who have bills to introduce, and I will withdraw the motion to adjourn temporarily to allow them that privilege.

INTERNAL-REVENUE TAXES, ETC.

Mr. HISCOCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10415) to reduce internal-revenue taxation and duties on raw sugar, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

OATHS OF CERTAIN OFFICERS.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R 10416) prescribing the mode of administration of oaths to the officers, directors, and agents of banking associations; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SECTION 3709, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 10417) to amend and re-enact section 3709 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SECTION 5209, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R.

10418) to amend and re-enact section 5209 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIS, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported a bill (H. R. 10419) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain works on rivers and harbors for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee.

Mr. STORM. All points of order are reserved on that bill.

RESTORED INDEMNITY LANDS.

Mr. NELSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10420) for the relief of purchasers of restored indemnity railroad lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

TERM OF UNITED STATES COURT, DULUTH.

Mr. NELSON, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 10421) to provide for a term of court at Duluth, Minn.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SECTION 5159, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10422) to amend section 5159 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I now renew the motion.

Mr. SOWDEN. I demand the regular order.

The motion of Mr. MCMILLIN was then agreed to, and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BARBOUR: Petition of James Bulger and others, for compensation for damages to property on South Capitol street, between B and C streets south—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. HERMANN: Petition of 214 citizens of Oregon, asking for the passage of the Hatch experiment-station bill—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE: Petition from members of the Wisconsin Valley Grange, No. 151, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. 2933) for the establishment of agricultural experiment-stations—to the same committee.

By Mr. MORROW: Memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Eureka, Cal., accompanied by statistics regarding the commercial importance of Humboldt Bay, &c., praying for an appropriation to improve the channel in the entrance to the harbor—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. NEAL: Petition of John M. Kimbrough, of Monroe County, Tennessee, asking that his case be referred to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Petition of the Consolidated Cattle Growers' Association of the United States, relating to the suppression of exotic diseases among the cattle of the United States—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, resolutions of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, relative to a national bankrupt law—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PERKINS: Resolutions of the Board of Trade of Topeka, Kans., protesting against certain features of the interstate-commerce bill as agreed to by the conference committee—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, resolutions of the Arkansas City Post, Grand Army of the Republic, asking for the passage of a bill granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Pittman, widow of Alexander H. Pittman, a soldier of the late war—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, resolutions of the same for the passage of the pension bills recommended by the legislative committee of the Grand Army of the Republic—to the same committee.

By Mr. RYAN: Remonstrance of the Board of Trade of Topeka, Kans., against the interstate-commerce bill—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. ZACH TAYLOR: Petition of Louise Paul, for an increase of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. VAN EATON: Papers relating to the claim of Varina B. Gaither, of Adams County, Mississippi—to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

MONDAY, January 10, 1887.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

JOSEPH E. BROWN, a Senator from the State of Georgia, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Supervising Architect of that Department, recommending an appropriation for the extension of the public building at Newark, N. J., and an appropriation for heating apparatus in certain other public buildings; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 6th instant, a report of a board of engineers in regard to bridging the Mississippi River at or near Saint Louis, Mo.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a recommendation of the Chief of Ordnance, that an appropriation of $20,439.88 be made for the completion of a new fireproof milling shop at the National Armory at Springfield, Mass., to be included in the sundry civil appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CHITTENDEN BROTHERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 7, 1887.

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Senate be requested to send to the House a duplicate engrossed copy of Senate bill 938, for the relief of Chittenden Brothers, which passed the Senate August 4, 1886, the original engrossed copy of said bill having been lost.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the request of the House of Representatives will be granted, and the order suggested will be made.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILMINGTON, N. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 229) to provide for the erection of a public building at Wilmington, N. C.; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills received on Friday last from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. 5131) for the relief of A. F. and N. C. Saint John;

A bill (H. R. 5262) for the relief of Mrs. Frances Marshall.

The bill (H. R. 6312) for the relief of James M. Grigsby was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. 5775) for the relief of James M. McKamey was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying that the expenses of keeping the western rivers clear of snags be made a permanent charge on the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a memorial of the Minneapolis (Minn.) Board of Trade, remonstrating against sections 4 and 5 of the interstate-commerce bill, as agreed upon by the conference committee, with the request that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE INTERSTATE-COMMERCE BILL.

To the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Minnesota:

GENTLEMEN: The Minneapolis Board of Trade, at its regular meeting of December 22, 1886, unanimously adopted the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That while this board of trade fully approves the general principle of national legislation for the control and regulation of our interstate carrying trade, and while in the main it concurs in the provisions of the compromise bill now pending before Congress, it thoroughly disapproves and deprecates the provisions of section 4, relating to what is known as the long and short haul, and of section 5, relating to pooling arrangements between parallel or competing railway lines. In the judgment of this board, section 4, if enacted, would give to the proposed national commission powers whose exercise would always be dangerous and might easily become destructive to the interests of the distinctively agricultural sections of the country.

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed with instructions to forward the foregoing resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, accompanied with a letter of transmission which shall more fully set forth the views of this board."

In forwarding these resolutions to you, permit the undersigned, as the committee appointed for the purpose, to call your attention to the following brief summary of objections, which, in the judgment of our board of trade, lie against sections 4 and 5 of the pending interstate-commerce bill, and respectfully to express the opinion that you can in no way render a more important or timely service to your constituents than by aggressively helping to secure the omission of these sections from the measure before it becomes a law. Allow us also, in passing, to remind you of the fact that, of the entire membership of the Minneapolis Board of Trade, representing all leading branches of legitimate business and productive industry, not half a dozen have any pecuniary interest in railroads, direct or indirect, and we do not know of half that number who are so interested. The board speaks for the producers and shippers of the Northwest. Further, it is fully recognized that national supervision of our railway system is necessary and best, in the interest both of the people and of the railways themselves; that this supervision has already been too long delayed; that there are wrongs to be righted and corporate abuses to be corrected, and that the pending interstate-commerce bill, when duly amended, will constitute a wise first step in the right direction. It is simply insisted that a measure which is necessarily experimental and which deals with the most complicated and far-reaching commercial problems known to mankind, vitally affecting the interests of every class and of every section, should not go so far, or attempt so much, at the outset, as to cause infinite damage where it might accomplish unmeasured good.

OBJECTIONS: THE "LONG AND SHORT HAUL."

(1) Section 4, relating to the "long and short haul," is, intentionally or unintentionally, vague and ambiguous in its language. If enacted into law its interpretation by the courts must, therefore, be wholly uncertain, its practical application doubtful, and some of its effects impossible to predict. This is sufficiently shown beforehand by the known fact that scarcely two persons understand the section alike—even zealous advocates of the bill, as it stands, differing widely as to the real meaning and intent of the words employed.

(2) Assuming that the section means what its language naturally imports, the consequence of enforcing such a law would, we believe, be gravely injurious to many important interests in all parts of the country, but especially would such enforcement prove destructive in its effect upon the great agricultural section, of which our own State forms so important a part.

It would very greatly increase the cost to our people of heavy commodities of all kinds which are brought in from Eastern sections, including coal, without which our prairie farms could not be occupied.

It would ruinously depreciate the value of every bushel of wheat and every pound of beef produced in Minnesota, by compelling the railroads to adopt a freight tariff on through shipments eastward, which, if not prohibitory, would leave to our farmers no reward for their labor and invested means.

It would depress manufacturing industries and deprive many workingmen of employment.

It would reduce to a minimum the trade of the Northwest by largely destroying the purchasing ability of our producers.

It would drive a large share of the long-distance traffic from American to Canadian lines.

It would cripple, if it did not bankrupt, many railroads, by compelling them to relinquish a large part of either their through or their local traffic—both of which are essential to their solvency.

The very people who ought to derive most benefit from legislation of this general character—the farmers and wage-earners of the country—would be the first and greatest sufferers from its injurious effects.

(3) It is not a sufficient answer to say that the bill gives to the proposed commission discretionary power to avert these otherwise inevitable calamities. The ambiguity of language, already mentioned, renders it doubtful whether this power is fully given; and even if it is conferred, its exercise would be a most unnecessary and dangerous prerogative to be vested in any untried commission, however able and disinterested, under an untried statute, in a difficult field, where national legislation is now making its first tentative venture. At best, it gives to five men, about whose competency, experience, and integrity nothing can be known in advance, almost autocratic power over the market value of hundreds of millions of dollars of railway stocks and bonds, over the market value of the agricultural products of half a continent, as well as of the lands upon which these products are grown.

So great a power and so tremendous a temptation to its abuse ought not to be presented unnecessarily to any committee of citizens or be made the foot-ball of politics. Besides, so enormous would be the task undertaken, and so extensive its domain, that no commission, however capable, could successively consider and adjust the inevitable frictions and controversies in time to prevent the predicted evils, if those evils in fact impend.

THE PROHIBITION OF RAILWAY POOLING.

(4) Section 5, which arbitrarily prohibits the pooling of railway earnings, is not less objectionable than section 4. It proceeds upon the assumption that an amicable apportionment of traffic among substantially parallel railway lines destroys wholesome competition, creates a "monopoly," results in exorbitant transportation charges, and thus wrongs the general body of producers, shippers, and consumers, who constitute the people. With exceptions so rare as only to prove the rule, this assumption is a fallacy, and legislation based upon it must prove a hurtful blunder. The facts are that such apportionments of traffic are a natural and necessary outgrowth of the development of our national transportation system; that they constitute the only plan of self-preservation for railroads which time and thought and experience have been able to evolve from a most difficult and perplexing situation; that they are the only known and feasible alternative for that system of cut-throat competition which foments chronic "rate wars," and which, unless held in check, would end in the bankruptcy, first of the weak lines, and then of the strong ones—for a bankrupt railway, having no responsibility to bondholders or shareholders, is the most reckless and destructive of competitors. These adjustments and divisions of traffic, known as railway pools, do not raise transportation charges above a reasonable level. Almost without exception they have resulted in holding rates steadily at the lowest point at which the business can be done at a living profit. This is notably illustrated just now, as you are aware, in our own section. Never was there a closer pooling arrangement between trunk lines than that which now exists between the six roads leading from Minneapolis to Chicago, yet never were freight tariffs so low as at the present time, and never were the people better accommodated.

The well-known fact that, concurrently with the development of the railway pooling system, railway rates have steadily, greatly, and everywhere decreased is a summary refutation of the whole theory on which section 5 is founded.

The pooling or apportionment system, besides preserving railways from insolvency, and railway investments from destruction, directly benefits every business community by giving some degree of uniformity and stability to transportation charges, and thus enabling business men to shape their course with greater certainty and safety. A railway rate war, although it temporarily reduces the market price of transportation below actual cost, is universally and justly regarded as a misfortune to all legitimate lines of trade. Obviously it is of no advantage to the public to enjoy any service at less than its reasonable cost, including a fair return upon the capital invested in rendering that service. The rule of unregulated and unreasoning competition, followed by the "survival of the fittest," when applied to railroads, means their own ruin, with resulting calamity to every other business interest which is worth preserving.

The railway pool, honestly administered, is the natural balance-wheel of interstate commerce. Secton 5 of the pending bill does not provide or suggest any substitute for this regulative and conservative agency. On the contrary, it would seem to render commercial chaos legally obligatory.

(5) It is not a sufficient answer to say that if found to be injurious in their working, these provisions may be repealed at the next session of Congress. The mischief that can be accomplished by their operation during a single business season is simply immeasurable, and there is not the slightest necessity for assuming the risk.

The interstate-commerce bill has adequate scope for its initial purpose without including the sections to which objection is here made. Omitting these, the bill lays the broad foundation of a system of salutary legislation, which a little time and experience will develop and perfect. It is evolution, and not revolution, that the situation calls for. Such a policy will avoid the risk of serious and disastrous mistakes; at least it will not invite that demoralization of now reviving business, that shock to commercial confidence, that stagnation of enterprise, that aggravation of the labor difficulties, that wholesale depreciation and destruction of values which many competent and disinterested students of the problem foresee in case the bill becomes a law in its present form. The panic of 1873 was precipitated and intensified, if it was not largely caused, by injurious State legislation affecting railroads, hastily enacted in response to unreasoning clamor. It would seem to be hardly the part of wisdom or of statesmanship to incur even the liability of repeating that experience, and on a larger scale, during the present century.

With great respect, your obedient servants,

A. B. NETTLETON,
H. A. TOWNE,
EDMUND J. PHELPS,
T. B. WALKER,
Committee.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., January 5, 1887.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of Albert F. Damon and other citizens of Philadelphia, Pa.; the petition of William Spencer and other citizens of Germantown, Pa.; and the petition of James Doak, jr., and others, employés of the Standard Mills of Philadelphia, praying for a reduction of internal taxes; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of Daniel Rowe and others, of Gardner, Mass., praying for the enactment of the Hatch experiment-station bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SPOONER presented the petition of Jerome B. Burke and others, a committee of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of the Potomac, praying for the passage of the bill for the relief of ex-Union soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their dependent families, in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I have the honor to present a petition from merchants, planters, steamboatmen, officers of the General Government, and others, respectfully presenting their petition, begging therefor careful consideration of its reasons, and soliciting the relief prayed for.

They represent that in the State of Louisiana there is a large natural stream of water, known as Bayou Lafourche, which is fed from the Mississippi River, at a point on which is located a town called Donaldsonville, about 190 miles above the mouth of the Mississippi River, at the delta or jetties thereof. It commences at a point between the thirtieth and thirty-first degree of north latitude, and between the fourteenth and fifteenth degrees of west longitude, and flows southerly from that point into the Gulf of Mexico.

This Bayou Lafourche is, during high water of the Mississippi River, say between January and August annually, a navigable stream, having an average depth of about 20 feet, and sufficient to enable vessels of 750 tons burden to navigate the same from its mouth at Donaldsonville to its entry into the Gulf of Mexico, by reason of the influx into the bayou of the waters of the Mississippi River.

During the remaining months of the year the bayou is navigable only for flatboats of about two feet draught of water, and burden insufficient to accommodate the interstate trade and commerce, and the necessary State commercial affairs of the citizens of the United States, living in various towns and owning properties on or contiguous to the bayou.

The petitioners further represent that between the months of July and January the planters harvest their crops of rice, sugar, and molasses, and it is their desire to ship at once to market, but they are unable to do so in consequence of the extreme low water in said Bayou Lafourche. For the same reason they are put to great expense and inconvenience in getting their supplies necessary to supply the wants of their farmers, laborers, and citizens. During the months of October, November, and December, 1886, the navigation of the Bayou Lafourche was, for the greater portion of those months, suspended even for flatboats of the smallest capacity. The crops of the season of 1885-'86 were as follows: 35,491,500 pounds of sugar, 2,263,700 gallons of molasses, 67,024 barrels of rice, besides large crops of potatoes, onions, and other products, making a total valuation of, say, $2,280,929.50, and the supplies shipped will fully aggregate the value of the products raised on the Bayou Lafourche—aggregating about $6,000,000.

There are several towns situated on this bayou, notably Donaldsonville, with a population of 3,000; Thibodeaux, with a population of 5,000; and Franklinville, with 3,000.

I will state for the benefit of the petitioners that it would have been a great deal better for them to have applied to the engineer in charge of this district, because the uniform course of Congress is to make such appropriations only as are recommended by the engineers of the district in which the streams are located.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE presented a petition of 44 citizens of Northern Ohio interested in the navigation of the upper lakes, praying for the continued improvement of the harbor of Grand Marais, Mich.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of George H. Ely and 134 vessel-owners, iron and coal companies, and leading business men of Cleveland, Ohio, earnestly remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. 6104) providing for the construction of another bridge across the Saint Marie River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER presented a concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of South Carolina, favoring an appropriation for the work of completing the Charleston jetties; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Eureka, Cal., praying that an appropriation of $500,000 be made to improve the channel of Humboldt Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TELLER presented a petition of the executive committee of the grand lodge of the Independent Order of Good Templars of the State of Colorado, on behalf of a membership of 3,000, praying for the favorable and early passage of the bill (S. 1579) granting to the people of the District of Columbia the right to determine by ballot whether intoxicating liquors may hereafter be legally manufactured and sold in that District or not; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAWLEY presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Bridgeport, Conn., praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. 8923) extending the privilege of immediate transportation of dutiable goods to Bridgeport, Conn.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of William Flood, George E. Brown, and other residents of Greenwich, Conn., praying for the repeal of the limitation of payments of arrears of pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of the Erie (Pa.) Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, praying for the passage of laws protecting the Chinese residents of the United States against outrage, and for the passage of the pending indemnity bill without delay; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. EVARTS. I present a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, embracing a report and resolutions of that body unanimously adopted on the 6th instant, on the subject of interstate commerce, now pending.

The results to which this important commercial body came on this very serious question were unanimous, and the memorial is accompanied with some statements and explanations of the reasons from a practical point of view by the merchants of the city of New York. They favor the general system of having a commission and of having the pending bill adopted; but on the subject of the fourth and fifth sections, relating to the long and short hauls and the pools, they present their reasons against the permanent adoption of any such regulations without further investigation, and suggest very grave reasons why they should not be adopted at all.

The considerations which are embraced in this examination by these intelligent representatives of the great city of New York, give a very concise and perfect statement of the views of the business community. I ask that the memorial may lie upon the table, and that it may be printed and appear in the RECORD to-morrow. I may desire to make some comment upon the measure and should be glad to have the text of the memorial before the Senate that it may be understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to have printed in the RECORD the memorial presented by him from the Chamber of Commerce of New York. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered. The memorial will lie on the table.

The memorial is as follows:

THE INTERSTATE-COMMERCE BILL.

At the monthly meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, held January 6, 1887, the following report and resolutions in regard to the interstate-commerce bill, before the United States Senate, were unanimously adopted:

To the Chamber of Commerce:

The undersigned committee, requested by the executive committee of this chamber to examine the bill known as the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce, beg leave repectfully to report that, upon analysis of the bill in question, the following provisions are found to be embodied therein:

ANALYSIS OF THE BILL.

Section 1: The bill is not to apply to the transportation of passengers or property wholly within any one State. It declares that all charges made for or in connection with any transportation (covered by the bill) shall be reasonable and just, and all others are prohibited, and declared to be unlawful.

Sections 2 and 3 prohibit, directly or indirectly, any special rebate or drawback, and any discrimination in charges against any person, firm, or locality, or against any particular description of traffic, in transportation of passengers or property, under like or substantially like circumstances and conditions; and also require that every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall accord all reasonable, proper, and equal facilities for the interchange of traffic between their respective lines, but provides "this shall not be construed as requiring any such common carrier to give the use of its tracks or terminal facilities to another carrier engaged in like business."

Section 4 makes it unlawful for any common carrier to charge or receive any greater compensation for the transportation of passengers or property, under substantially like circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer haul over the same line in the same direction, unless the common carrier receive in special cases, after investigation, authority from the commission to charge less for the longer than for the shorter haul; and the commission is empowered to prescribe the extent to which the common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of the act.

Section 5 is an absolute prohibition against pooling in any form.

Section 6 obliges the common carrier to plainly print in large type, and keep for public inspection, schedules showing the rates and fares, including terminal charges, for the transportation of passengers and property, and which shall also include the classification of freight in force upon such railroad. It also provides that no change in rates shall be made without ten days' previous public notice thereof; and, further, that every common carrier shall file with the commission copies of all contracts, agreements, or arrangements with other common carriers in relation to any traffic affected by the provisions of this act; it also provides for the enforcement of these provisions by the circuit courts of the United States.

Section 7 makes it unlawful for a common carrier to enter into any contract or agreement, express or implied, or, by other means and devices, to prevent the carriage of freights from being continuous from the place of shipment to the place of destination.

Sections 8, 9, and 10 prescribe the damages for a violation of this act, and methods of legal procedure.

Sections 11 to 17 provide for a commission of five persons, to be appointed by the President; regulates their terms of office; defines their qualifications, one of which is, that they shall not hold stock or bonds of any carrier embraced within the bill; also their powers and duties, and prescribes their relations to the courts, and further outlines the legal proceedings connected with the enforcement of this act.

Section 18 fixes the annual salary of each commissioner at $7,500, and provides for a secretary at $3,500 per annum, and allows mileage to commissioners when traveling.

Section 19 establishes the office of the commission at Washington city, but permits commissioners to prosecute inquiries and hold special sessions in any part of the United States, when so required by circumstances or necessity.

Section 20 requires full annual reports from all common carriers, subject to the provisions of this act.

Section 21 requires a report to be annually made to the Secretary of the Interior, to be by him transmitted to Congress; said report to contain any information and data collected by the commission, with such recommendations for additional legislation as they may deem necessary.

Section 22 excludes from operation of this law property carried free for the United States, the States, or municipal governments, or for charity.

Section 23 appropriates $100,000 for the purposes of this act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888.

Your committee believe that the national welfare requires that an interstate commission should be appointed, and they are of the opinion that this bill, in its main features, has been carefully considered and wisely framed.

They believe that the absolute publicity and uniformity required by this bill will largely cure the evils of which the public have in former years had good reason to complain. They believe that experience has demonstrated that secret rates, drawbacks, and like devices for concealing discriminations, on the part of the common carriers, to favored persons, firms, or localities, have been the principal cause of the public dissatisfaction with railroad management.

Your committee believe that rates on the railroads should be as uniform, under like circumstances, and as well known to the public as custom-house duties.

Your committee are of opinion that (section 4) the prohibition to charge more for a shorter haul than a longer one is objectionable and certain to work against the public welfare. If enacted, it would do little good to any one. Local rates would not be thereby reduced, but "through traffic," which, on the average, furnishes not to exceed one-quarter of the revenues of the trunk lines, would be either refused, or raised to a standard of local rates—thus obstructing and materially decreasing the moving and exportation of cotton, grain, petroleum, and other products. Upon the utmost freedom in making through contracts from the West to the seaboard depends the development of the entire West and its farming lands. The gigantic results already witnessed, due to the fortuitous combinations of railroads and water transportation, and the ability to carry this through traffic for trifling additional cost, and so far at very moderate rates of freight, has produced a wealth to the whole nation so far exceeding any possible local benefits to be gained by the proposed prohibition as to forbid its consideration. Nor is this provision necessary to protect the local resident from imposition; his remedy is provided in the bill, quite independent of the through traffic. If a local rate is unjust it must be remedied; but the consideration thereof must depend upon the particular surroundings and circumstances of that individual case, and not upon that of others further on the line, who may have competing roads, water transportation, and many other things affecting rates of freight not at all applicable to the case in question. One immediate and inevitable effect of such a prohibition would be to divert most important volumes of freight to competing Canadian roads running to the seaboard.

As to section 5, your committee is also of opinion that the absolute prohibition against pooling is unwise, and much more likely to work injuriously to the public than beneficially. If it be considered, it will be evident that most if not all of the evils of unequal rates, discriminations, and partiality have arisen from unrestricted competition, the only result aimed at by the proposed prohibition, while a uniform tariff between all competing lines, arranged upon planes of equity to all shippers, and enforced by an agreed volume of tonnage apportioned to each road, is the very end to be accomplished by the bill itself—and this is "pooling." Its actual operation has been to do away with discriminations against individuals and localities; it has secured greater uniformity of rates; it has been found of greater advantage to shippers to deal with a "pool" commissioner, representing all the trunk lines, than to be compelled to confer with many officials in detail—as instanced in the late dry-goods classification agreement—its existence has secured a steadily decreasing average rate of freight, which has developed during the whole period of "pooling." In general the system seems to have been productive of good to the public, and in many instances where injustice has arisen it has been from lack of good faith to keep its conditions on the part of the common carrier. While, on the other hand, its tendency has been to avoid disastrous railroad wars, entailing upon the investors serious loss, and always productive of disastrous effects upon the laboring classes and the commerce of the country.

For these reasons this committee would urge that any action looking to prohibition of pooling be at least deferred, and the subject referred (as was originally proposed by the Senate bill on this subject) to the commission to be established by this bill, for full investigation, report, and suggested legislation, if they deem any needed, in the future.

It is true that the framers of this bill, evidently fearing the strict operation of section 4 (as it regards the long and short haul), have lodged the discretion with the commissioners to limit or suspend, after investigation, its operation in certain cases. And if it be wise to confide to them so great a power, it can not be unreasonable to leave the whole subject (affected by sections 4 and 5) to them and their discretion, which would be the case were no clauses of this character contained in the bill. If any discrimination of an unjust character arises, the commissioners are fully vested with power to investigate and correct the same, and this seems to be all that is required at present, and until more experience is gained by the commission.

To this chamber the public are largely indebted for the investigation of the Hepburn committee, which led to the appointment of the railroad commission of this State. This commission has proved eminently satisfactory both to the public and the railroads, and has performed great public service.

The experience of our State railroad commission should furnish a valuable guide and precedent for the larger and more important duties of an interstate commission. When a law was passed creating a railroad commission in this State the powers and duties of the State commission were largely advisory. This chamber was of the opinion that the powers of this commission were too limited, but experience has demonstrated that the law was wise and salutary. The advice of the commission to the railroad managers has been followed in most instances, in spirit if not in letter. Publicity and public opinion have satisfactorily supplied the place of mandatory provisions of the law in this State.

In conclusion, your committee beg leave to offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce approve of Senate bill known as 1532, with the exceptions of section 4, prohibiting greater charges for the shorter than the longer haul, and also section 5, which contains an absolute provision against pooling. They believe these sections, for reasons stated in above report, should be stricken out or amended as suggested herein.

2. Resolved, That as the commissioners under the proposed law will be charged with important and intricate business duties, they should, as far as the political and non-partisan considerations mentioned in the bill will admit, be selected with reference to their experience and knowledge of the business interests of the country, and that the agricultural, commercial, and railroad interests should all be represented upon such a commission.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

CHARLES S. SMITH,
CORNELIUS N. BLISS,
A. FOSTER HIGGINS,
Committee.

NEW YORK, January 4, 1887.

JAS. M. BROWN, President.

A true copy. Attest:
[SEAL.]

GEORGE WILSON, Secretary.

Mr. EVARTS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of New York city on the subject of the coast defenses, and praying for the passage of a bill in relation thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

Mr. VANCE presented a petition of manufacturers of North Carolina, praying for the repeal of the internal-revenue laws and a reduction of the tariff; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VEST. I present the petition of Gerard B. Allen and a number of other citizens of Saint Louis, praying that an appropriation of $80,000 be made for the improvement of the old custom-house in that city. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Appropriations, as the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have authorized me to report an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill carrying out the purpose of the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I present a petition of the Brooklyn Library Union, urging the passage of the bill (S. 194) known as the Blair educational bill, setting forth therein in a preamble that whereas the foundation-stone of republican government is based in the intelligence and moral rectitude of its people, they therefore respectfully urge Congress to pass a bill whereby suchnational aid to education may be given as the importance and exigency of the matter may seem to warrant. The petition is signed by the officers of the union. I move that it lie on the table, the Senate having acted on the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAIR. I present the petition of the National Women's Temperance Union of the United States, addressed to the President and the two Houses of Congress, in which they set forth that "the undersigned, committee of the National Women's Christian Temperance Union, on behalf of their constituents, numbering 200,000 Christian women of the United States, most respectfully but most earnestly pray the President and your most honorable body to investigate the appalling evils resulting from the liquor traffic which is forced upon the helpless natives of the Independent State of Congo by the civilized nations who ought to be their teachers and protectors, and in view of these evils to prohibit the further importation of alcohol in any form into that country by any citizen of the United States." Signed by Frances E. Willard, president of the organization; Caroline B. Buell, corresponding secretary; Mary A. Woodbridge, recording secretary; L. M. N. Stevens, assistant secretary; and Esther Pugh, treasurer; also by the secretary of the World's Christian Temperance Union, it being an international organization as well as national.

In presenting this petition and asking its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I should like to call the attention of the chairman and such members of that committee as are present to the fact that this is a matter of importance; that the principal commerce now being carried on with the sixty millions of men, women, and children in the Congo State, which through our agency-in-chief came to be recognized by civilized nations, is on our part intoxicating liquors, and is rapidly murdering that sixty millions of people, as civilization has hitherto destroyed by substantially the same means populations less developed in other parts of the world.

I saw not long since a well-authenticated statement that New England rum carried into a negro village in one of those states, in a single drunken wrangle had resulted in the death of two hundred of the natives; and our consuls report to the Department that a very large proportion—I designed to have had the data with me so as to have given the facts more definitely to the Senate—a very large proportion of what we ourselves carry to the Congo state and other civilized nations is simply the destructive agency of that alcohol in one form or another.

This is a petition praying for the investigation of this subject. I ask its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I assure that committee that I shall call attention to it again unless it is reported upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WHITTHORNE presented a petition of the trustees of the Triune church, Williamson County, Tennessee, praying for pay for property taken and used by the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS presented resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of the city of Lawrence, and resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of the city of Topeka, in Kansas, favoring certain modifications in the pending bill to regulate interstate commerce; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McPHERSON presented a petition of citizens of Bound Brook, N. J., praying for a repeal of certain taxes; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLUMB presented a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Topeka, Kans., and resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Lawrence, Kans., favoring certain modifications in the bill to regulate interstate commerce; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GORMAN presented a petition of certain masters and owners of vessels, praying for the erection of a light-house at Maryland Point, on the Potomac River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALL. I present the petition of Mrs. Hester Perrine Walker and other persons, the sons and daughters of Dr. Henry Perrine, praying for the restoration of the grant made by the United States to Dr. Perrine in 1840, the terms of which were complied with in part by him until his massacre with some members of his family on Indian Key, on the coast of Florida. Dr. Perrine lost his life in an attempt, under the sanction of Congress, to develop in the most southern part of the United States such tropical and semi-tropical productions as it was thought would be a benefit to our people. I move the reference of the petition, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Public Lands, and ask their consideration of the peculiar circumstances of the case and the claim of the petitioners to some favorable action by Congress.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were therefore signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 1829) for the relief of the Greensburg Limestone Company, and others:

A bill (S. 1353) referring to the Court of Claims for adjudication the claims of John H. Kinkead, Samuel Sussman, and Charles O. Wood;

A bill (S. 2901) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey the United States custom-house and post-office property at Eastport, in the State of Maine, lately destroyed by fire; the proceeds thereof to be invested in the purchase of a new site for, and to provide for the erection of, a new public building at that place;

A bill (H. R. 1034) for the relief of Bangs, Brownell & Co.; and

A bill (H. R. 1877) for the relief of John McNaughton.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3004) to establish two additional land offices in the State of Colorado, reported it with amendments.

CENTENNIAL CONSTITUTIONAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration of the Anniversary of the Adoption of the Constitution and the Discovery of America to make a partial report. I report two resolutions, of which I ask the present consideration.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient that order be taken by Congress for the due celebration at the city of Washington, on or about the 30th of April, 1889, of the centennial of the inauguration of the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved further, That the Select Committee on the Centennial of the Constitution and the Discovery of America be directed to consider and propose the best mode of carrying out the foregoing resolution.

The resolutions were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LAND IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives, to the bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes, to report back the same with the recommendation that the Senate non-concur in the amendments, and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives thereon. I make a motion to that effect.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. DAWES, Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, and Mr. BOWEN were appointed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 3091) to prevent the sale of adulterated food in the District of Columbia and the Territories of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3098) to amend the act giving approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANDERSON. By request of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON], and in his name, I introduce a bill. The bill (S. 3099) granting an increase of pension to Joseph D. McClure was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 3100) to amend section 1225 of the Revised Statutes concerning detail of Army officers to educational institutions, &c.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3101) to authorize registers and receivers of land districts to subpœna witnesses, and fixing their compensation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 3102) for the relief of H. C. Rogers, late deputy commissioner of internal revenue; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 3103) granting a pension to Henry Stafford; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3104) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge over the Mississippi River at Grand Tower, Ill.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 3105) for the relief of Thomas G. Mackie and the heirs-at-law of William A. Hyde, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 3106) granting a pension to Milton Teeter; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3107) granting a pension to Catharine F. Ellsworth; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3108) granting a pension to James Lucas; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3109) for the relief of Mathew O'Regan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, introduced a bill (S. 3110) for the relief of A. C. Gibbs and B. F. Dowell, attorneys-at-law, for defending Lieut. George A. Goodale, commanding Fort Klamath, Oreg., under charges of false imprisonment and loss of property in two cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. FRYE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOLPH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOLPH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALL submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Mrs. Estella W. Jacobs be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

SMITHSONIAN AND NATIONAL MUSEUM REPORTS.

Mr. MORRILL. I submit the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed of the report of the Smithsonian Institution and of the National Museum for the year ending June 30, 1886, in two octavo volumes, 16,000 extra copies of each, of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 6,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 7,000 copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

This is the usual resolution. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

COLUMBIA RIVER STEAMBOAT RAILWAY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions the morning business is closed.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the interstate-commerce report.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask the Senator from Illinois to yield to me that I may give a notice.

Mr. CULLOM. I yield for that purpose with pleasure.

Mr. DOLPH. Some time since I introduced a resolution directing the Secretary of War to make an examination of the Columbia River at the Dalles and to report as to the practicability of a steamboat railway, and an estimate of the cost of the same. I had intended this morning to call it up for the purpose of submitting some remarks, in accordance with a previous notice, but I understand that some Senators desire to speak at once upon the interstate-commerce bill, and I give notice that to-morrow morning, immediately after the morning business, I shall ask to call up my resolution for that purpose. However, if during the course of the debate upon the interstate-commerce bill this afternoon a point should be reached at which it would be deemed best by the friends of the bill that it should be postponed for further consideration until to-morrow, as I understand some Senators desire to speak to-morrow, I may ask leave during to-day's session to call up my resolution.

FLORIDA LAND FORFEITURE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overlooked the fact that resolutions came over under objection, the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL]. They will be read.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. CALL January 7 were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the grant approved May 17, 1856, granting lands to the State of Florida for the construction of a line of railroad from Fernandina, Fla., to Tampa, Fla., and from the Saint John's River, Florida, to Pensacola, Fla., should be forfeited as to all lands not earned before the time fixed in the act for the expiration of the grant, viz, ten years from the date of the approval of the act, in May, 1856; and that the said lands so forfeited shall revert to the United States and be subject to homestead settlement, reserving to all actual settlers the right to 160 acres of land, and the right to enter at the price of $1.25 per acre 80 acres of land where they have purchased the same or the improvements on it; and that the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to report a bill to the Senate to this effect.

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be instructed to bring suit, through the district attorneys of the United States, for an injunction against all corporations or their agents attempting to sell or advertise for sale the lands of the United States embraced in any grants made to States or railroad companies while bills for the forfeiture of the same are pending before Congress, as to all grants that have been recommended by the committees of either House of Congress to be forfeited.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senate to allow those resolutions to lie on the table, and I shall call them up in a short time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolutions will lie on the table.

INTERSTATE-COMMERCE BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the interstate-commerce bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is before the Senate.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I desire to be as brief as possible, and therefore I will ask not to be interrupted during my remarks, as I am sometimes led off into other matters in that way.

Mr. RANSOM. I am going to ask a favor of my friend from Kentucky. There is a little bill on the Calendar, the bill (H. R. 7988) which it will not take half a minute to pass, and I am satisfied it will be passed at once when it is read. It ought to be passed. As soon as it is heard the Senator from Kentucky and everybody else will see that it should pass. I ask his permission to let me call it up.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Illinois controls this measure.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not hear the remark of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. RANSOM. There is a little bill on the Calendar which ought to be passed. It affects a person ninety-five years of age. It is unanimously reported.

Mr. CULLOM. If it does not interfere with the Senator from Kentucky and will take no considerable time, I have no objection.

Mr. RANSOM. I hate very much to interrupt my friend for a second, but I know when he hears the bill read he will be glad I called it up.

Mr. BECK. Go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the following bill——

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent. I should oppose the motion, but I have no objection to its being taken up by unanimous consent.

BRYANT WATERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7988) granting an increase of pension to Bryant Waters.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to increase the pension allowed Bryant Waters, late a private in Capt. I. G. Blount's Company, Eighteenth Regiment United States Infantry, who served in the war of 1812, to $30 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RANSOM. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Kentucky.

HOUSE PENSION BILLS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3167) to restore the name of Lifurs Roberson to the pension roll;

A bill (H. R. 4028) granting a pension to Samuel Sawyer;

A bill (H. R. 4852) granting a pension to William Hutchison;

A bill (H. R. 5398) granting a pension to Mrs. Margaret Cashin;

A bill (H. R. 6026) granting a pension to John Selby;

A bill (H. R. 6069) granting a pension to Owen P. Wilson;

A bill (H. R. 7335) granting a pension to Michael Todd;

A bill (H. R. 7390) granting a pension to David B. Caldwell;

A bill (H. R. 7547) granting a pension to Livingston Clark;

A bill (H. R. 7716) granting a pension to Lizzie Brown;

A bill (H. R. 7748) granting a pension to John H. Stucker;

A bill (H. R. 7911) granting a pension to Daniel Schultheis;

A bill (H. R. 8424) granting a pension to James H. Young;

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the report of the committee of conference which we must either adopt or reject as a whole, presents the issue fairly between those of us who believe that the great interstate railways are, and of right ought to be, subject to law, and those who think that they are and ought to be a law unto themselves; that is the question, disguise it as we may.

After a struggle of more than ten years the committees of the two Houses have for the first time agreed on a bill which they submit as the very best that can be had, saying it is that or nothing. Of course the railroads want nothing. No bill could be framed which their advocates would not oppose, and because this bill is not perfect and some of its provisions may hereafter need modification they insist that the railroads shall continue to exercise unlimited control over interstate commerce, discriminating in rates and classifications in charges for short hauls far greater than for hauling over the whole line, in granting rebates to favored shippers; in short, that they shall carry on their business as though the public had no rights which they are bound to respect. The defeat of the pending measure, either directly or by amendment, accomplishes their purpose.

As long as the House and Senate moved in diverging lines they felt safe. When the two Houses come together, as their conferees have done, the railroads feel the importance of exerting all their power to defeat this measure, as they would any measure which subjected them to the control of Congress. Not being a member of the committee having this bill in charge, I am not as familiar with its details as some Senators who have studied them, but I think I understand its general scope and purpose. My long service on the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard brought before me the complaints against the discriminations by the railroad pools in favor of the Standard Oil Company; the Pacific Railroad extortions on way freights; the anthracite coal combinations; the unjust rates imposed on shippers of dressed beef in the interest of the stock-yard rings, and other kindred evils which Congress alone can remedy. I have never doubted that it is not only the right but the duty of Congress to prevent by well-defined and carefully-guarded laws all discriminations, extortions, and combinations on the part of the great corporations engaged as common carriers of our interstate and foreign commerce over the public highways, which Congress and the States have authorized to be constructed for the common good and equal use of all the people. The Supreme Court has conclusively settled the question that Congress, and Congress alone, can protect the people against extortions of that character, and that the States are powerless.

It has done so in the most emphatic manner within the last four months in a case about which there was no dispute as to the facts, and no difference of opinion as to the wrong inflicted, or as to the propriety of punishing the railroad company as a wrong doer. I refer to the case of the Wabash, Saint Louis and Pacific Railway Company vs. The State of Illinois, decided by the Supreme Court at the October term, 1886, in which Mr. Justice Miller delivered the opinion of the court, and Mr. Justice Bradley the dissenting opinion. The record presents the whole question so fully and fairly that I need only quote briefly the facts and conclusions of law as shown by it. It shows that—

The Wabash, Saint Louis and Pacific Railway Company, an Illinois corporation, plaintiff in error, was sued by the State of Illinois to recover a penalty for the breach of its laws, passed to prevent extortion and unjust discrimination in the rates charged for the transportation of passengers and freight on railroads in the State.

The law sued on was originally passed in 1871, and revised in 1873.

The declaration alleged, in substance, that the company charged certain parties 15 cents per 100 pounds for carrying a load of freight from Peoria, in the State of Illinois, to New York, 109 miles of the distance being in Illinois, whilst at the same time it charged certain other parties 25 cents per 100 pounds for carrying a like load of the same class of freight from Gilman, also in the State of Illinois, to New York, 23 miles of the distance being in Illinois, both places being on the line of the road. This allegation was substantially admitted, and judgment was finally rendered in favor of the State, and was sustained by the supreme court of the State, to which the present writ of error was directed.

The main point insisted on by the railway company in its defense was, that the law on which the action was founded is unconstitutional, in its application to their case, as being a regulation of interstate commerce.

Among other things, the railroad company asked for the following instruction:

The court further holds as matter of law that the transportation in question falls within the proper description of "commerce among the States," and as such can only be regulated by the Congress of the United States under the terms of the third clause of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States.

All of these propositions were denied by the court, and judgment rendered against the defendant, which judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court on appeal.

Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States, after a full citation of authorities closes thus:

Of the justice or propriety of the principle which lies at the foundation of the Illinois statute, it is not the province of this court to speak. As restricted to a transportation which begins and ends within the limits of the State, it may be very just and equitable, and it certainly is the province of the State Legislature to determine that question. But when it is attempted to apply to transportation through an entire series of States a principle of this kind, and each one of the States shall attempt to establish its own rates of transportation, its own methods to prevent discrimination in rates, or to permit it, the deleterious influence upon the freedom of commerce among the States and upon the transit of goods through those States, can not be overestimated. That this species of regulation is one which must be, if established at all, of a general and national character, and can not be safely and wisely remitted to local rules and local regulations, we think is clear from what has already been said. And if it be a regulation of commerce, as we think we have demonstrated it is, and as the Illinois court concedes it to be, it must be of that national character, and the regulation can only appropriately exist by general rules and principles, which demand that it should be done by the Congress of the United States under the commerce clause of the Constitution. The judgment of the supreme court of Illinois is therefore reversed, and the case remanded to that court for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

The State courts are rapidly conforming their action to this decision, and are surrendering all the jurisdiction they had attempted to assume in this class of cases, so that Congress must act, or by its refusal declare that the railroads are beyond the reach of law. I find the following among the late dispatches:

A QUESTION OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE DECIDED BY THE BOSTON COURTS.

BOSTON, January 8.

The full court has given an important decision in the case of the Commonwealth vs. Housatonic Railroad Company, which involves a question of interstate commerce. On July 25, 1885, the Massachusetts railroad commissioners, acting under the statute of 1885, chapter 338, passed order fixing the maximum rate which the Housatonic road might charge for transporting certain kinds of freight between points in Massachusetts and Connecticut. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant company had unlawfully violated this order by charging a higher rate than the commissioners allow.

The defendant contended that section 2 of the statute named, under which the order was made, is invalid because in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, Article I, which gives Congress the exclusive right to regulate interstate commerce. The court sustains the defendant, citing the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Wabash, Saint Louis and Pacific Railroad Company vs. The People of Illinois, in which a statute against unjust discrimination was involved. The decision is written by Chief-Justice Morton, and of course invalidates the order of the railroad commissioner.

It will be observed that in the Wabash case there was no dispute as to the act of the railway company being wrongful, as an unjust discrimination in favor of one citizen against another; it was conceded that the offending corporation ought to be punished. The court, after full hearing, decided that the duty of protecting the people against that and other wrongs of like character devolved upon Congress, because it was beyond the jurisdiction or control of any State. So that, if we fail to provide means of redress, the people of all the States are without remedy against the discriminations, extortions, and combinations of the railroad companies engaged in the interstate or foreign carrying trade. The laws of Illinois could and would have punished the Wabash Company for its unjust discrimination in this case, but the State courts were powerless, because Congress alone has the constitutional authority to do so. Yet we are told that we will ruin the business of the railroads if we subject them to the same rules in interstate commerce that the States have subjected them to in the carrying of State commerce. The distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], while opposing this bill, concedes that it carries out the law as decided by the Supreme Court. He opposes the principles of law as settled by that tribunal, as shown by the following extracts from his speech on this floor:

He said:

I can not subscribe to the doctrine that interstate commerce can only receive protection against the wrongful acts of private persons, or public and private corporations, through the action of Congress in providing laws and tribunals for their regulation or punishment.

This bill is based solely on that false premise. It opens the door to the interference of Congress with every regulation of trade and commerce, whether sanctioned by universal custom or by express or implied agreements between the parties concerned. It exposes the charter rights of every railroad company, given by the States, to modification and repeal by acts of Congress.

It multiplies indefinitely the list of crimes punishable by statute in the Federal courts, and correspondingly narrows the power of the States to punish their own citizens for crimes committed within their borders, because the commerce against which the crime is directed is interstate commerce, and is therefore within the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress.

This claim of the exclusive power of Congress to legislate, whether for the freedom of commerce or against it, is made in this bill to depend on the interstate character of the traffic, and that is made to depend on the will of the shipper. The States can make no regulations touching the subjects or objects of interstate commerce, according to the theory of this bill and of the Supreme Court.

All I care to say in answer to that criticism of the law, as he concedes it to be, is that it must be apparent that our failure to pass laws punishing railroad officials who are guilty of such discriminations and extortions is obviously to license them to continue practices, which no Senator will venture to justify, or even assert ought to be tolerated. The bill before us simply asserts that the railroads are public highways, and that their managers are common carriers, and as such that their rates must be reasonable, and that they shall not discriminate between individuals or corporations, either by differences in charges or by rebates or drawbacks, and that their rates of charges shall be made public. It does not attempt to prescribe rates further than to prohibit a higher charge for hauling over any part of their line than is made for hauling over the whole length of it. It does not legalize as high a rate for a short haul as may be charged for hauling over the whole length of the line. It leaves the carriers to justify, if they can, the charges they make for short hauls under the provision that they must be reasonable, only declaring that it is per se unreasonable to charge more for hauling over part of a line than for hauling over the whole length of it. The only other provision, and that the commission may on certain conditions modify or suspend, is that they shall not form pools or combinations among themselves to maintain arbitrary people the benefit of the reduction of charges which competition alrates, but shall compete for business fairly and honestly, giving the ways secures. I believe the country will accept this bill as an honest, earnest effort to break up the favoritism, the extortion, the unwarranted control over interstate and foreign commerce which many of the railroad managers have exercised and maintained for the last twenty years.

It is only within the last few years that the railroad advocates would admit that Congress could interfere to prevent discriminations in their rates or extortions in their charges, as the arguments filed before the committees of the Senate and House show. It was only when the unjust charges and flagrant extortions of the Pacific railroads on way freights were exposed, and facts which the managers could not deny were made manifest, such as charges of $800 a car to Ogden, Virginia City, or Reno, when a like car similarly laden would be hauled on the same train past these places to San Francisco, many hundreds of miles farther, for $300, that the railroad attorneys had to admit that there must be a power somewhere to prevent and punish such outrages on the people along the lines. They had to abate the arrogance of their demands for unlimited control over interstate and foreign commerce when it was proved before State and Congressional committees, and admitted by their own agents, that the leading railroads of the country, embracing the New York Central, the Erie, and the Pennsylvania system, had, by their pools and other illegal combinations, destroyed all competition of the producers of petroleum with the Standard Oil Company, and had built up that monster monopoly in fifteen years from an insignificant organization, with less than $1,000,000 of capital, to a mammoth monopoly with over $100,000,000, not less than $50,000,000 of which was stolen—no milder word will express the truth—by the railroads and Standard Oil conspirators, through their pools, by discriminations, rebates, and extortions from the people of the country and their competitors in trade.

As a complete vindication of my assertions, I ask Senators and all others who doubt the truth of my statements to read the third chapter of a work entitled "The Railways and the Republic," published in 1886, by J. F. Hudson. The chapter is headed "The History of a Commercial Crime." I commend its careful perusal, especially to the boards of trade and chambers of commerce now so earnestly protesting against the passage of this bill, venturing this assertion, that if the facts therein stated were laid before any commercial board in America not one of them would vote for a continuance of the system under which such monstrous outrages have been committed with impunity, and may be repeated. As it may not suit the advocates of the continuance of absolute power in our railroad magnates to read the chapter referred to, I will read a few extracts from it to the Senate. After showing in detail the processes by which all competition was destroyed, Mr. Hudson, on page 83, says:

This made the monopoly absolute master of the refining trade. It controlled every avenue of transportation, managed all the largest refineries in the land and was able to shut off every competitor from either receiving supplies or shipping its product. If any refineries in any part of the land were permitted to run they owed their immunity to their insignificance. The Pittsburgh refiners, who had struggled for four years against the domination of the Standard, were left without any avenue of escape, and the rigor of their fate can be perceived from the fact that at the beginning of 1878, nearly every firm of the original refining interest of Pittsburgh had either made the best terms practicable with the Standard or accepted the alternative of the bankrupt courts.

From its original common-place proportions the Standard had at this time swelled to a corporation whose wealth was estimated to exceed $30,000,000. The sources from which most of this wealth is drawn may be understood from the disclosures afterwards made of the discriminations in its favor. Up to that time these favors could only be inferred from the fact that the Standard could ship oil over the trunk lines when none of its competitors could do so at prevailing rates. The first legal avowal of its rates was in the case of H. L. Taylor et al. vs. The Standard Oil Company, in which it was alleged by the plaintiff that a rebate of $1 per barrel had been paid by the railways to the Standard. The reply of the Standard admitted a payment of a rebate, but denied that it was of the amount named. Subsequently Mr. A. J. Cassett, of the Pennsylvania road, testified before the New York legislative investigating committee that in eighteen months the railways had paid to the Standard the sum of $10,000,000 in rebates. The period covered by the testimony was a year or two later than the time now under consideration; but the inference is plain that the rebates paid the Standard during the period of its growth from an ordinary corporation to a complete monopoly were equal to its entire increase of wealth for that time. In other words, its entire profits were comprised within the discriminations made in its favor by the railways.

The compact by which the railways surrendered themselves and the public interests to the rule of the Standard was well understood to be vital and binding; but of its exact and shameful details the public was kept in ignorance until two years later, when the correspondence, comprising the contract, was brought out by legislative investigation. In this contract the Standard assumed the power of parceling out the traffic not only between the different trunk lines but between the different cities. Of the shipments to the seaboard 63 per cent. should go to New York, of which the New York Central, the Pennsylvania Railroad, and Erie were each to carry one-third; of the remaining 37 per cent. the Pennsylvania Railroad was to be given twenty-six shares and the Baltimore and Ohio eleven. For guaranteeing this division of the traffic the Standard received a "commission" (as it was called in this document) of not less than 10 per cent. of the rate. This commission was stipulated to be subject to indefinite increase, but under no circumstances to reduction. It was also reinforced by the important provision that no other shipper of oil should have any commission or rebate whatever, unless his shipments were as large as those of the Standard.—Correspondence of William Rockafellar and Thomas A. Scott, October 17, 1877.

As the railways had already raised the Standard to the position of controlling over 95 per cent. of the trade, and had crushed out nearly all its rivals, it will be seen that the probability of finding such a shipper to enjoy equal terms with the monopoly was very remote. Nor with the Standard in control of the trade was it likely to have any difficulty in carrying out its guarantee of the percentages which it had parceled out among the railways. The compact was a league and covenant between the railways and the Standard, that no independent competition in the petroleum trade should be permitted by the railways. It bound the corporations to the principle that competition was to be abolished, and handed over the producers and consumers alike to the tender mercies of the monopoly which was established by the power of the railways.

That is a specimen of the condition of railroad management which we are told it is ruinous to interfere with or to attempt to control. The Standard Oil Company's extortion is only one phase of the system. It reaches every branch of industry; the coal, iron, wheat, live stock, and dressed beef transportation from State to State are all at the mercy of like combinations and pools if Congress fails to prohibit them, because the Supreme Court has decided, as I have already shown, that the States are powerless to do so. I would like the managers of the boards of trade, who are so fearful just now that Congress will cripple the railroads by this law, to take a vote of their members as to whether such combinations as I have just laid before the Senate ought or ought not to be prohibited by law, as the bill under consideration proposes. The people of Pittsburgh and elsewhere tried to obtain relief by law, and by laying competing pipe lines, but the railroad and Standard Oil combination was too strong for them even before the Pennsylvania Legislature. I read from the chapter referred to, page 88:

An attempt was made to bring a new pipe line to Pittsburgh, which produced another movement for a free-pipe law. The oil regions united with a few refiners in asking for that measure; but in vain. Even the attempts to hold a public meeting in favor of the new bill were smothered by the Standard. To prevent the expression of independent public opinion, a meeting called for that purpose, in Pittsburgh, was packed by the workmen of the Standard refineries, who howled down every speaker advocating commercial freedom in the oil trade. Paid articles in the press asserted that the measure would take the refining trade from Pittsburgh and carry the whole business to other States. As this was just what the Standard was doing—the oil business at Pittsburgh having at that time diminished 50 per cent.—only those who wished to earn the Standard's wages were affected by such a plea. But that class, especially among the lawmakers of Pennsylvania, was numerous enough to secure the defeat of the free-pipe bill. That measure was again voted down, and the attempts to secure an independent line of transportation were abandoned.

There was one small city that had pluck enough to hold out, and it is the only one known to me that had. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] says we ought to be proud of it. That was Columbus, Miss.

Even at such a distant point as Columbus, Miss., when the grocers claimed the right to sell independent petroleum that had reached them by the river route, the monopoly established a grocery store and sold goods below cost in order to drive the merchants into submission. In this case, happily, the monopoly was defeated, as the merchants unitedly refused to buy the oil of the Standard Company until it retracted its claim of dictation; and, perhaps, because of the smallness of their trade and their location they were successful.

That was the only case he could furnish. He adds:

In Baltimore the rebellious merchants were punished by the sale of petroleum at retail from these wagons at a price lower than that which the Standard charged to jobbers; but the difference was made up by raising the price to the people after the local merchants had been driven out of the trade. In short, for the seven years since the establishment of its absolute empire, the Standard Company, as a journalist puts it, has "bullied the trade of the country, wholesale and retail alike." With its power to control the retail trade, at one time checking shipments and glutting the market with crude oil, at another taking exactly the opposite course, accompanied by its almost unlimited resources for manipulating the speculative exchanges and by the constant rebates through which it monopolizes the export trade, the accumulation of wealth by the Standard has been unchecked. Its resources, which in 1873 were $1,000,000, and in 1878 had grown to $30,000,000, are now rated at the enormous sum of $100,000,000; and as the capital stock of the Standard Trust Company and the American Transfer Company at par amount to nearly that sum the estimate is probably not excessive.

Again he says:

If the Standard had not been raised to its present tyrannical power there would have been in its place an independent interest of fifty or a hundred firms, shipping, in the aggregate, as great or a greater amount of freight. Aside from the public aspect of the question, there is no doubt that it would have been better for the railways to carry the natural shipments of such a legitimate business than to depend upon the dictates and favors of a monopoly. It has often been shown, and notably in the report of the Hepburn committee to the New York Legislature, that in endowing the Standard with railway favors, out of which it has made a hundred millions of dollars in ten years, the policy of the railway managers was practically no less a betrayal of the interests of their shareholders than it was an assault on public right and justice.

* * * * * * *

Gloss over the methods used by whatever specious argument the railway advocates please, they built up a great monopoly and crushed out an independent trade. They were conceived in favoritism and dishonesty, brought forth with the aid of corruption and conspiracy, and in full growth and maturity are a curse to the independence and integrity of the nation. If the Western bandits whose career has been so sensational had been able to amass as great wealth as the Standard, by highway robbery, their riches would not have demoralized the public more than the success of this corporation. They would at least have secured their gains at the risk of their lives. But the wealth of the Standard represents no such courageous dishonesty. It represents the reward which can be obtained by securing the favor of the railways to crush out open and honest competition; by bribing legislators to prevent equitable laws, and by employing all the powers of corruption and intimidation which immense hoards of money possess, to maintain arbitrary power and illegal monopoly. Apart from the encouragement it gives to similar attacks upon the independence of other industries, the success of greedy and unscrupulous wealth can not fail to be demoralizing in all its influence. When gigantic dishonesty meets with such gigantic success, what wonder is it that more ordinary forms of the same evil prevail? In all its direct and indirect results as the wrecker and destroyer of legitimately obtained prosperity, as a monopoly of an essential industry, and as a corrupter of public and business morals, the Standard Oil Company is an unmitigated evil and a public curse.

The infliction of that curse upon the nation must be charged to the policy which unites the railways in efforts to suppress competition among themselves and to give favored shippers a monopoly of the traffic by discriminating rates.

* * * * * * *

These four corporations—

Referring to the New York Central, the Erie, the Pennsylvania, and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroads—the exemplars and leaders of the railway system of the country, furnished to that conspiracy against independent commerce and free competition the active strength and support which made its success possible. Without their steady and persistent violation of the great rule of equal privileges to all shippers the project for the subjugation of the petroleum trade would have died still-born. In assigning to them the responsibility for such an attack upon commercial liberties, is it too severe to declare that the four leading railways of the country are guilty of the great commercial crime of the last decade?

I hope the boards of trade of the country will publish that exhibit to the world, and advise the people whether it is a system that commends itself to them as one that ought to be perpetuated.

Mr. President, it is impossible for the representatives of the States and people to sit supinely by and see the whole power vested by the Constitution in Congress to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations usurped by railroad corporations acting in combination under the pooling system. Even Congress can not impose a tax on exports. Yet the railroad pool can not only impose an export tax in the form of a double rate on transportation, but they can do it without a moment's warning, when the crops of the country must be moved to the seaboard. They not only apply all the taxes so imposed to their own use, but under the "pool" system they divide the plunder with roads that carried little or none of the freight in order to prevent them from carrying it at a cheaper rate than the managers of the pool have determined to exact. Worse than all, they can, and as I have shown do, haul for one customer or set of customers for one-half the tax or charge they impose on others. So that, not only the commerce of the country, but the fortunes of all engaged in it are at the mercy of a few railroad magnates. Yet we are told by boards of trade, professing to be the guardians of our commerce, that we will ruin the country if we prevent combinations, discriminations, rebates, and drawbacks, and require equal rates, publicly advertised, to be given to all shippers alike.

There can be no higher evidence of the omnipotence of the railroad pool than its ability to obtain from respectable boards of trade such resolutions as are daily sent to us, urging us not to interfere with this railroad despotism. I deny that railroads have any right to "regulate commerce among the States," or to grant favors to or impose penalties on either persons or localities on their lines. Their roads are public highways, and they are common carriers for hire. They should be protected by law in the enjoyment of all their rights as such, and each should be required to compete for business with the others. Whenever they undertake to charge one customer more than another for the same service or to interfere with the commercial operations of the people, they should be prohibited from doing so and punished if they disobey. Congress has the sole constitutional authority to regulate interstate commerce, as the State Legislatures have of the commerce of each State, and the common carriers under each system must be required to treat all who use their roads equally, and work for a reasonable compensation, giving public notice of any increase of their rates long enough in advance of the change for men to regulate their transportation and their purchases accordingly. The great fundamental principle which the passage of this bill will establish is that Congress not only proposes hereafter to regulate interstate commerce, but it proposes to require the carriers of it to do equal and exact justice to all people dealing with them.

We do not assume that all or indeed any of the railway managers will be guilty of unjust discriminations or extortions by passing this bill, any more than we assume that men are murderers and robbers because we pass laws punishing murder and robbery. We assume it to be our duty to prescribe in advance what shall be the punishment for such offenses, so that no one can plead ignorance of the law or of the punishment which will follow its violation. But I must hurry on. One of the ablest advocates of the railroads said:

The necessities of modern progress rendered a modification of old theories and even old principles inevitable; and since the introduction of railroads the idea that private property taken for the purpose of travel in a peculiar manner and under new conditions is a public highway is no longer tenable and in practice is not recognized. The old theory of the rights of the public in such a road was necessarily modified in practice, though it still lingered in the minds of some jurists.—W. F. Crafts, Scribner's Monthly, October, 1881.

That was for a long time the general tone of all the advocates of these corporations, even before the committees of Congress. Indeed all the railroads have tried to maintain that their lines are their private property, to be used as best suited their interests, but the courts—State and Federal—have uniformly decided against all their assumptions, and maintained that they are created by sovereign powers which could only be exercised for public uses, and that the right of each citizen to use the road on equal terms with every other citizen is the supreme and controlling obligation of the managers of each of them. Even Congress can not authorize private property to be taken except for public use. It may, by bad laws, accumulate half, or even all, the currency needed for circulation in the Treasury, and there may be no way to pay it out, yet it can not require any holder of our bonds not yet due to surrender them or to take the money for them, even with 50 per cent. premium added. Yet it can by a railroad charter authorize the homes of the people, that no money could buy, or their graveyards, sacred to the dearest memories, to be torn down and desecrated in order to establish a public highway for the equal use of all the people. Congress could not confer such power for any private purpose, however important. That fact effectually disposes of all pretense of private rights or interests in railroads being either superior or even being allowed to conflict with the fair, equal, reasonable use of these highways by all the people.

What would be thought of a turnpike company that undertook to charge one man a dollar and another twenty-five cents at its toll-gates for wagons exactly alike, laden with an equal quantity of similar freight, or which refused to allow any wagons but those of its managers to pass its toll-gates at all if engaged in hauling coal, upon the ground that the turnpike company had made arrangements to control the coal trade, as the railroad companies have done time and again in regard to the express and special freight business over their lines; and what would be thought of boards of trade protesting against an act of the legislature requiring the highways to be kept open for the use of all the people at "a stipulated, reasonable, uniform toll," which is all we propose to do by this bill?

Redfield on Railways, chapter 11, page 229, says:

That railways are but improved public highways, and are of such public use as to justify the right of eminent domain by the sovereign in their construction is now almost universally conceded.

He supports this statement by a long list of authorities, State and Federal. The railroad is no more private property than the turnpike; on one the freighter runs his own wagon, on the other the common carrier furnishes it; but the principle of public right, uniform charges, and impartiality in use relates equally to both.

The advocates of the railroads have been driven to admit the truth of these principles after years of resistance; their last refuge is that the principle is founded on an "obsolete theory, not now applicable to their complicated and important system." I can not better answer that argument than by again reading from Mr. Hudson's work, page 150. He says:

But it is worthy of notice that the constitutional provisions of the leading States in the Union are fully as explicit as the common law in declaring the public character of the railways and in asserting their subordination to the legislative power in all matters affecting the public interests. The "obsolete theory" that the railways are public highways finds direct enunciation in the most recently enacted State constitutions. In Arkansas, Alabama, Colorado, Indiana, Louisiana, Missouri, Nebraska, Pennsylvania, and Texas the constitutions adopted within the last decade all declare that the railways are public highways. The constitutions of California, Georgia, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, and Wisconsin affirm the right of the Legislature to regulate the operations of the railways, while many other States have practically asserted that right by its actual exercise, and it has never been successfully denied. Of the fifteen constitutions referred to, twelve explicitly forbid discriminations between shippers or passengers, while in other States a similar prohibition is implied by the constitution or by laws made under its authority. Pools or combinations between different railroads to the prejudice of other railroads are forbidden by the constitutions of Arkansas, Illinois, Colorado, Georgia, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, Pennsylvania, and Ohio. Rebates and drawbacks are prohibited by constitutional enactments in Arkansas, California, Georgia, Missouri, and Pennsylvania, while the much-defended practice of charging more for a short haul than for a longer haul over the same line is forbidden by the constitutions of Pennsylvania, Missouri, Arkansas, and California, and by the highly-lauded statute law of Massachusetts.

To sum up, the railway is created by law to fulfill a public purpose—that of affording improved transportation on equal terms to all persons whom it can serve. Whatever is necessary for the honest and impartial discharge of that one function it has a right to do. It can make such charges as will yield it a profit on the investment of its capital; but it must distribute the burden of its charges evenly among all its patrons in proportion to the service rendered. It is designed to overcome the obstacle of distance; but it should overcome that obstacle for the benefit of all, and it is not within its objects to bring one locality nearer to market than another and to make the latter support it in doing so. It is a public servant, and not a public tyrant which can enrich and magnify its favorites at the general expense. It may own and control a franchise in its tracks and rights of way, but it has no right to control legislatures, or to compel courts and public officers to do its bidding. It is not a commercial providence to exalt one vessel to honor and condemn another to dishonor. It is not a political guild to sway by its capital, its commercial power, and the work of its employés, the business of the people. It is not a modern baron with supreme power over the property and prosperity of its subjects. It is not endowed by the State with the power to rule the business of the nation, dictating in what manner or over what routes the people shall carry on their commerce, or the amount of business that they shall transact. A creature of the State, it must not become a conspirator against commerce, either by building up monopolies for its favorites, or by organizing them for its own profit.

The necessity for Congressional action was made so apparent that the bill now before us, in the shape it then was, passed the Senate at the last session of this Congress on a call of the yeas and nays by a vote of 47 to 4, and it passed the House as amended in that body on the 30th of July last, by a vote of 192 to 41. Now, when the Conferees on the part of the two Houses have agreed on a bill satisfactory to both, it seems to me that it ought to become a law. The subject had been referred to a committee, and full opportunity for objection to its provisions had been given to the railroads and all their adherents before it was acted on, as the report of the committee shows.

No man can justify the conduct of many of the great railroad corporations in their treatment of the vast interests necessarily confided to their care and management. Take the anthracite-coal railroad pool, which is perhaps the oldest and best maintained, and therefore the most atrocious of this system of "pools;" its discriminations, extortions, and combinations to limit production in order to increase the price of the product have become so outrageous that the governor of Pennsylvania had to order the attorney-general to proceed against them in the name of the commonwealth. I again read from Mr. Hudson's work, page 211:

In this case the evils of combination—

Referring to the anthracite-coal trade—have been increased by the direct interest of the companies in the business which furnishes their chief traffic. The legislative investigation referred to showed that excessive and outrageous discriminations against shippers had been made of the coal roads. After a thirty days' strike—

The interests of labor are carefully guarded by them!

After a thirty days' strike the private mine-owners had consented to the wages demanded by the miners, and would have supplied a large trade, but the railways, which were also miners as well as carriers, and were determined not to yield to their men, raised the freight rates of the private firms to three times their former standard. By this means the price of coal was brought up to $12 a ton, and the private operators, their workmen, and the consumers of coal were made to feel the power of the great railway and mining companies. It is not necessary to follow out in detail the steps by which the railways established their absolute power in all branches of the coal trade. Enough that the result is that of 270,000 acres of anthracite-coal lands in Pennsylvania 195,000 are now owned by six railways. One effect of uniting, in the same corporations, the business of shippers and that of carriers is the enormous inflation of their capital.

I ask Senators to pay attention to what I shall now read, as I shall refer to it hereafter.

Their aggregate capitalization amounts to $500,000,000, while the actual cost of the roads and equipment for transportation is $114,000,000.

For the purpose of securing a profit on this stupendous amount of inflated capital, the policy of combination has been carried to an unequaled extent. Not only was competition in transportation suspended by a division of traffic between the railways, but the competition of the mines was stopped, as far as possible, by agreements which limited the output of anthracite coal to an arbitrary total fixed by the combination.

This amounted to 30,000,000 tons only during the past two years.

These agreements are enforced by ordering the suspension of mining at such time as the railway combination determines; sometimes for one-quarter of the working time in a year.

God save the protected laboring man from such friends!

We have seen that the combination contends as vigorously to prevent an advance of miners' wages as to maintain the price of coal; and hence the artificial advance of price brings no corresponding increase of pay to the labor employed. In fact statistics show that the average wages paid to the men engaged in this severe and arduous work ranges from $350 to $400 per year. The restrictive powers of the combination are extended over the distribution of the product. No wholesale dealer can engage in the anthracite coal business without the consent of one or the other of the lines forming the combination, or without conforming to the fixed and arbitrary wholesale prices prescribed by the companies. Some of the eccentricities of the artificial means used to sustain prices have been exposed in a previous chapter. The burden of the control established over both producers and consumers, by the anthracite and bituminous coal combinations, has been estimated at $31,000,000 annually. Whatever may be thought of the accuracy of this calculation, there is no doubt that the combination controlling the coal trade of Pennsylvania has, by restrictions upon that industry and artificial prices for its products, inflicted a vast and wholly unjustifiable burden upon the producers and the public.

I again ask, ought such things to be possible and Congress be told that they can not and ought not be regulated and controlled by law? The statement that their aggregate capitalization amounts to $500,000,000, while the actual cost of the roads and equipment for transportation is $114,000,000, is a startling one, and would seem incredible but for the incontrovertible proof that has been furnished to State and Congressional committees of the methods employed to produce these results. Some very striking examples are given by Mr. Hudson to illustrate the system. For example, he says (see page 270):

The South Pennsylvania Railroad project illustrates, in many striking features, the great railway abuses of the times. The projectors of this enterprise, in itself legitimate and desirable, had an offer to build and equip the road for $10,000,000, and they planned a liberal inflation by raising that sum on bonds and making the stock capital wholly fictitious. But the project fell into the hands of the Vanderbilt interest, and the plan was found to be wholly insufficient. The stock was placed at $20,000,000, and the bonds at the same amount. A contract was made with a construction company, said to consist of Mr. Vanderbilt's clerks and brokers, to do for $15,000,000 the work which a responsible contractor had offered to do for $6,500,000. The $15,000,000 were to be furnished by a syndicate of capitalists from New York, Cleveland, Philadelphia, and Pittsburgh, who were to receive for their subscriptions the $40,000,000 of securities. It is now asserted on good authority that the sum of $10,000,000 is an ample estimate of the legitimate investment represented by the $40,000,000. Upon this basis of $1 in capitalization for one of cost the greatest railway capitalists of the country conducted this enterprise, until, in pursuance of a broader policy, they sold out to the Pennsylvania Railroad, deserting the men who had put the money into the project in good faith to secure a competing line, that they might establish the monopoly of the New York Central and Pennsylvania roads over their respective districts.

In regard to the New York road, which was held up as an exemplar of freedom from inflation, and one of them is enough. After telling how the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad watered its stock, he says:

It is sufficient for the present purpose to cite the conclusion of the New York legislative committee, from the testimony of experts, that the property of the company, capitalized at $155,000,000, could be replaced for $65,000,000; that the most moderate estimate of the actual "water" in its securities was $53,163,881, not including a loss of $10,800,000 by discounts in the sale of $25,000,000 of bonds. The capital stock of the company is $85,000,000, representing, according to this most moderate view, $22,000,000 of actual investment; while others estimate that the bonded securities of the company alone represent the entire amount invested in the property, and $10,000,000 more; so that the entire share capital and part of the bonds are a stupendous mixture of wind and water.

The report of the New York legislative committee puts it in this language:

It matters little for the purposes of this report whether $50,000,000 or $70,000,000, representing nothing save mismanagement, prodigality, and pilfering, have been injected into the capitalization of this road, and are now seeking to drain interest and dividends from the commerce of the country. In either case the wrong is equally glaring and the demand for a remedy equally imperative.

One more extract and I am done with that branch of the question:

A still more notorious and flagrant example of stock inflation is that of the Pacific railroads. The public are familiar with the record of this creation of stupendous wealth out of the loan of a government subsidy and the gift of an empire of land. It has been told by Mr. Charles Francis Adams in detail, and with an authority that is emphasized by his present position at the head of one of the companies. The story of the construction company, the "Credit Mobilier," upon whose stock, the investment in which was nominal, the greater portion of the shares and debt of the Union Pacific Railway was distributed as dividends, is part of the record of national politics. It is also well known how the Central Pacific Railway was built. A company of capitalists whose resources at the beginning of the enterprise were $195,000, with the aid of loans from the city of Sacramento and Placer County to the extent of $550,000, built enough road to draw $848,000 from the United States Treasury as the subsidy for the first section, and by repeating the process constructed the entire road; with which, as a nucleus, they have now gathered a total capitalization of $139,000,000.

Similar illustrations might be found in the financial "ballooning" of the Northern Pacific, the Texas Pacific, and the Atlantic and Pacific; but an outline of the history of the two older corporations is sufficient for our present purpose. Their aggregate capital is $120,000,000; their funded debt, apart from the Government subsidy, is $136,000,000; and the contribution of the United States to their construction was $61,000,000, in the form of a loan, on which less than half the interest has been repaid by the companies. It is well known that of this capitalization, the stock does not represent a dollar of actual investment; that a large portion of the debt was pocketed by the constructors of the roads in the shape of contracts, which they made with themselves, to build the tracks at two or three times the legitimate cost; that the roads were almost, if not wholly, paid for by the Government subsidy; and that of the $259,000,000 of additional stock and bonds issued upon the properties, an estimate that one-third represents invested cash will be too liberal.

Little wonder that Mr. Poor, who is the highest authority known to me on railroad statistics, said that the actual cost in money of all the railroads in the United States in 1883 did not exceed their funded and floating debts, an aggregate of $3,787,000,000, and that the fictitious capitalization was $3,708,000,000. This is his language:

If it be assumed that the cost in money of all the roads in operation in the United States in 1883 did not exceed, as it certainly did not, the amount of their funded and floating debts, $3,787,410,728, the actual investment was a most profitable one. The net earnings for the year were $336,911,884, a sum equaling about 9 per cent. on their cost. If the fictitious capital could be eliminated from their accounts, their success, as investments, would have no parallel.

It is in this immense increase of fictitious capital that is to be found the cause of the general distress which prevails, and the enormous decline in the price of railroad securities. From 1879 to near the close of 1883 a most singular delusion rested upon the public as to their value, and this delusion was taken advantage of on a vast scale by able and unscrupulous adventurers. Whatever was manufactured and put afloat was seized with avidity by an eager and uninformed public. The delusion was increased and prolonged by payments on a very large scale of interest and dividends from capital. In this delusion the most loud-mouthed and unscrupulous promoters usually had the greatest success.

As I have said, Mr. Poor's work is the best railroad authority, and his statements are entitled to the highest consideration. I can add nothing to their weight or to strengthen their claim to reliability.

So much for that. While the provisions of the bill as to uniformity of charges, publicity of rates, and even the reasonableness of the provision in regard to the long and short haul are not seriously controverted, the tentative provision as to the pooling system is made the subject of serious complaint. The fact that "pools" are prohibited by the constitutions of nine States—Arkansas, Illinois, Colorado, Georgia, Ohio, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, and Pennsylvania—ought to be strongly persuasive evidence that the principle is vicious in practice, while the fact that all the wrongs committed under the Standard Oil monopoly were perpetrated under the pooling system, and all the outrages perpetrated by the anthracite railroad combination were the workings of the pool, ought to make Congress set its face against it. Mr. Hudson, at page 244 of his work, gives this case, which shows how Judge Baxter regarded pools:

An agreement, in the common form of money pools, existed between the roads engaged in the transportation of coal from the Hocking Valley regions, by which one of them, conducting a large traffic, was to pay a considerable share of its earnings to other companies, a draft upon its life blood which eventually sent it into the hands of a receiver. The receiver, after operating the road for some time, accumulated $100,000 of earnings, which, by the terms of the agreement, was to go to the other pooling companies. Hesitating to make a gift of funds to the competitors of the road while the bondholders were waiting for their interest, he submitted the matter to the court which had appointed him, the district court of the United States for Northern Ohio. Judge Baxter, with some of the indignation of the old fifteenth century judge already referred to, ordered that he should "not only not pay out this money, but to pay no money whatever for any such purpose while the road is in the custody of this court;" adding, "such contracts as these are no more to be respected by the law than any other gambling contracts."

Judge Baxter's form of expression is, to say the least, "pungent." A pool is simply a combination between railroad managers engaged in competition with each other for traffic to maintain such rates as they agree on by suspending competition and placing the trade and earnings of all in a common "pool" from which the business or its proceeds is divided among the confederated companies in fixed percentages. They never apply it to the local traffic, of which each has its own monopoly; each squeezes all it can out of that, and keeps it. When the States and the United States granted railroad charters, made grants of public lands and subsidies from the public Treasury, and cities, counties, and individuals aided by taxation and subscription of money, as was often done, to build these roads, it was on the assumption that the roads would compete honestly and fairly for business, and would carry freight and passengers at such rates as would pay to the stockholders a reasonable interest on the money actually invested in their construction and equipment, treating all their customers alike. Watering stock to create fictitious capital on which to claim that interest must be earned, forming pools to control business at rates which enable them to pay dividends on fictitious stock, and all devices to prevent honest, fair competition are unjust and should be declared illegal. Pooling is against public policy in other regards besides destroying the competition which the people have a right to the benefit of. It destroys all inducements for the roads to offer the best services or other accommodations to secure patronage, as the worst get their allotted proportion for the poorest service, the same as the best, whether they are patronized or not. When the pool protects its members against loss by the reduction of traffic that naturally follows mean accommodation; the public interest is always prejudiced. The result of such protection must inevitably be poor service, and the courts have always declared such combinations illegal on common-law principles.

The New York court of appeals had that question before them in regard to pools formed by the boatmen on the Erie Canal, and in declaring a pooling combination of the canal-boat owners to be illegal the court pointed out the inevitable tendency of such a system, as follows:

> The association being thus secure against internal defections and external encroachments, and the members having thus thrown their concerns into stock to derive an income in proportion to the number of shares they hold, and not according to their merit and activity in business, and safe against the reduction that would otherwise follow mean accommodations and want of skill and attention, the public interests must necessarily suffer grievous loss. Indeed, the consequence of such a state of things would be that freighters and passengers would be ill-served just in proportion that carriers would be well paid. (Stanton vs. Allen, 5 Denio, 534).

Perhaps the most arbitrary and unjust discrimination which the managers of the pool have been able lately to perfect and maintain in the interest of the railroad managers who own and control the stock yards along their lines is the charge of nearly double as much for hauling dressed beef as is charged for the same weight of live stock. There is not one-tenth part of the risk in hauling dressed beef that there is in hauling live animals. If accidents happen it is hardly possible to injure dressed beef seriously, and hardly possible to save live animals; but the stock yards make nothing out of dressed beef and they make what they please out of the hauling of live animals. In a note to page 221 Mr. Hudson says:

> Before the Hepburn committee Mr. Fink correctly said: "The proper basis of railroad tariffs is the cost of transportation." With regard to the live-stock and dressed-beef rates, he stated the principle on which the matter was settled to be that of putting "the dressed-beef and live-stock shippers on the same footing as regards the cost of transportation (which in this instance means freight charges) of the product of the animal to Eastern markets." In other words, the economy of the dressed-beef shipments was to be destroyed for the benefit of the live-stock interests of the New York Central and Pennsylvania Railroad managers.

That is about all there is of it.

Mr. President, I will not occupy the time of the Senate any longer in the discussion of this question. I had intended to vote for the report of the conference committee without saying a word; but when I was urged by intelligent boards of trade in Kentucky and elsewhere to vote against this measure, I thought it was due to myself and respectful to them to give the reasons why I can not comply with their requests. I am not an enemy of railroads. I would not knowingly do anything to impair their usefulness or deprive them of any legitimate rights to which they are entitled. They have done more than all other agencies to develop the resources of this continent. They have enabled us to control and almost settle the Indian problem. Without them, nine-tenths of the country west of the Mississippi would be a wilderness today. But for the cheap transportation they furnish, our exports would be a mere bagatelle, and the comforts of every man's home would be immeasurably lessened; but with all my high appreciation of their importance, and of the wisdom of sustaining and encouraging them in the developments they are making, I would require them to do equal and exact justice to all men, regardless of race, color, or previous condition. The bale of cotton shipped by the humblest negro, or the can of oil he had purchased to light his humble home, should be transported over the public railroad highways on precisely the same terms that Mr. Vanderbilt, Mr. Gould, or the Standard Oil Company could have it hauled for. I seek to substitute the undoubted authority of Congress over interstate commerce for the greed of interested railroad managers in regulating commerce among the States, and in securing equal rights to their citizens; and believing that the bill submitted to us by the intelligent conferees of the two Houses goes far toward securing these results without injury to any of the legitimate rights of the railroad companies, I shall vote for it.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I have not risen for the purpose of making a general speech upon this subject. I have been more inclined to say nothing on the subject than to occupy any time whatever; but certain portions of the bill as reported by the conference committee have been very fiercely attacked, and seem to be in a measure misunderstood, in my judgment, so that I have felt called upon to give expression to my views on one section of the bill alone at present. What I shall say to-day will be confined substantially to a discussion of the meaning of the fourth section of the bill. It may be that before the discussion is closed I shall have something to say upon other portions of the bill, but at present I shall confine my remarks to the fourth section.

Mr. President, the regulation of interstate railroad transportation is a subject that occupies a very conspicuous place in the thoughts of the American people. The magnitude of the vast interests to be affected by such regulation makes it necessary that the legislation proposed on the subject should receive the most thoughtful and deliberate consideration, for the commerce and prosperity of the entire country may be affected favorably or unfavorably, as the case may be, by the character of the regulations which Congress, in the exercise of its undoubted right to regulate, may see fit to impose upon interstate transportation by railroad. I recognize the importance and the great propriety of a full and free discussion of the measure now before the Senate, which may be so far-reaching in its consequences, and I am anxious that the effect and meaning of the provisions of the bill shall be fully understood, in order that the Senate may act upon it intelligently.

Since the report of the conference committee was made public the bill as it now stands has been critically analyzed by the ablest representatives of the various interests that will be most affected by its passage, in case it shall become a law, and has received a great deal of attention from the press and from the general public. It seems to me that the bill has stood the test of this general and critical scrutiny remarkably well. Its general provisions seem, for the most part, to have met with approval, while the feature which has been most strongly objected to seems to have been misunderstood, if not misrepresented, and it is this feature only which I desire now to undertake to explain.

I have not had time to carefully read all the numerous expressions of opinion upon the bill that have come under my notice, but, so far as I have been able to do so, it appears that the railroad managers and others prominently identified with railroad interests who have expressed their views publicly have directed their attacks almost wholly upon the "short-haul" section and the one prohibiting pooling. For the most part they criticise these sections and express alarm at their supposed effect upon the country, but take pains to explain with more or less qualification that they approve the general scope of the bill, or, at least, that they do not seriously object to its other provisions.

If the very able gentlemen who manage the railroads of the United States find only two points of serious attack in a measure which is intended to bring about, in many important particulars, a reversal of existing railway practices and methods of management, we have a right to assume that the bill is not, aside from the features which they specially criticise, unduly oppressive toward the railroads, or very far from right in its main provisions and regulations. And if these gentlemen are mistaken in their view of the probable effect of the two features which they attack, their objections to the enactment of the proposed law fall to the ground. I think they are mistaken, and that this will be made to appear during the course of the present debate; but, if I am mistaken and they are correct, I would be unwilling to give the measure my support.

It must be borne in mind, however, that any measure which Congress can enact upon this subject may prove to some extent ineffective and unsatisfactory until it has been supplemented by similar State legislation, just as the State legislation now in force in many of the States has been found ineffective and unsatisfactory in some respects because of the absence of national legislation. There is no way in which the entire internal commerce of the country can be subjected at once to the same uniform plan of regulation under the Constitution as it stands. Much of this commerce is beyond the jurisdiction of Congress, but if we will apply just and proper regulations to the interstate commerce now subject to our control under the Constitution, I am satisfied that within a few years the States which have not already done so will enact similar regulations, and that eventually the entire internal commerce of the country will be placed under a substantially uniform plan of regulation.

Until that time comes, however, it may be possible for the railroads to obstruct and interfere with the successful operation of the law to some extent, because of the divided jurisdiction of the States and the General Government over the subject, in case the railroads should not be disposed to accept in good faith the regulations Congress may impose upon them. But I do not look for factious or unreasonable opposition on the part of the leading railroads of the country. When once the bill goes into force, if it should become a law, I believe that the railroads will as a rule seek to give the law a fair interpretation and endeavor to live up to it.

But, however that may prove to be, we must expect a great deal of friction in attempting to put into practical operation a new and heretofore untried system of regulation—untried at least as to the interstate commerce of the United States. The questions that may arise can not possibly all be foreseen or guarded against. The requirements of the bill against unjust discrimination and favoritism as between persons, places, and particular classes of traffic will pinch very hard in a good many quarters. The "big fish" will be placed upon an equality with the little ones, or more nearly so, and we must be prepared to hear very energetic and very vigorous protests from those who have been enjoying all kinds of special privileges and advantages at the expense of the general public, and who will be convinced that the country is going to everlasting smash if their privileges are cut off. But I take it that it is our duty to legislate here with a view to securing the greatest good to the greatest number, and I have faith that, if the legislation now proposed can be fairly tested, its enactment will prove beneficial alike to the railroads and to the general public when it is once fairly in operation and when business has adjusted itself to the changed conditions which it will bring about.

I come now to the consideration of the much-debated "short-haul" section.

The objection made to this section as it now stands which, if it were well founded, I should regard as the most serious, is that it is indefinite and ambiguous, that it is open to more than one construction. Of course, we can not undertake to say positively what construction will be put upon the language used by the courts if they shall be called upon to determine the meaning of the section. It seems to me, however, that but one construction can be reasonably and properly placed upon this section, especially when it is considered, as it must be, in connection with the other provisions of the bill, and that its meaning is perfectly clear. But in view of the erroneous construction that seems to have been put upon this section in some quarters I deem it proper to state that there seems to be no difference of opinion as to its meaning among the conferees on the part of the Senate. I do not know that I ought to say this, but I venture to do so; and yet it may be that as to the minutiæ of my statement the other conferees of the Senate may not agree with me.

I think the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] understand the section as I do, and I think I am justified in saying that we would not approve it if we supposed or believed it to mean what some have claimed that it does mean or may be made to mean.

The short-haul section simply undertakes to lay down in specific terms a rule or principle which, as I have always contended, is already in effect contained in other provisions of the bill. The first requirement of the bill on the subject of rates is found in the first section, and is that all rates shall be "reasonable and just." This is, in effect, a declaration that under similar circumstances and conditions a greater sum shall not be charged for a shorter than for a longer distance, because under such circumstances it would not be "reasonable and just" to make such a charge. The next requirement of the bill that affects this question is found in the first part of the third section, which declares—

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

This is likewise a declaration that a greater sum shall not be charged for a shorter than for a longer haul under similar circumstances and conditions, because such a charge would be the making or giving of an "undue or unreasonable preference or advantage" to one particular "locality," or would subject some other particular "locality" to an "undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage."

Now let us see what section 4 says and means. It reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

As I understand it, this section as it now stands simply prohibits a railroad corporation from charging a greater aggregate sum—not a higher rate—for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, and under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, when the shorter is included within the longer distance. There is no other prohibition made in positive terms. The declaration that "this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance" does not in terms prohibit the charging as much for a shorter as for a longer distance, but simply withholds the legislative sanction from the making of such a charge. This qualifying clause negatives the inference that might possibly be drawn from the language of the section without these words, namely: that an equal charge for a shorter distance is authorized by inference because only a greater charge is prohibited. This qualification, therefore, leaves the question of whether an equal amount can be charged for the shorter distance to be determined by the provisions of the bill to which I have already referred, requiring all charges to be reasonable, and forbidding the giving of an unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular locality.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Illinois, with his permission, if he understands that the interpretation of the language of this bill that it only prohibits the charging a larger gross sum for the shorter than for the longer distance, and does not prohibit a larger proportionate charge for the shorter than the longer distance, is the sense in which the House of Representatives, as represented by their conferees, understand the bill, so far as he is informed?

Mr. CULLOM. I have no question but that every member of the conference committees of both Houses unqualifiedly and without mistake understands this not to be a prorate-per-ton-per-mile law, but that the corporations shall not be allowed to charge in the aggregate, in the sum total, the same amount for the short as for the long distance, unless under certain circumstances.

The requirement of the fourth section, then, is that as between shipments of the same kind in the same direction over the same line, and made under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, a greater sum shall not be charged for a shorter than for a longer haul when the shorter comprises part of the longer haul—not that a higher rate shall not be charged per mile, but that a greater aggregate sum shall not be charged. And I desire to say here, Mr. President, that one of the elements of opposition to this bill throughout the country has been the result of a misrepresentation of the meaning of the fourth section of the bill. There has seemed to be, on the part of those who want no legislation, a determination that that section of the bill shall be construed into a pro-rate-per-mile section, when I undertake to say that no man who has been on the committee ever dreamed that the language which is used in that section, and which has been used in it from the beginning since the select committee reported the bill to the Senate, could have that construction placed on the words used.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. Section 4 reads:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, &c.

What I want to get at is the meaning of these words, "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions for a shorter than for a longer distance on the same line, * * * * the shorter being included within the longer distance." To explain what I desire to get at, I will make this inquiry of the chairman of the committee: Take a long haul, from San Francisco to Portland, Oreg., over a railroad running from San Francisco to Portland. Transportation by rail over a route like that, of course, is affected to a certain extent by steamship competition, by steamers running between the terminal points. Now suppose a short haul, between points intermediate of those two terminal points, say from Stockton to Roseburgh; would that come within the provisions of the section? Would that short haul, included in this long haul, be subject to the influence of steamboat competition? Is that a haul "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions" as the haul over the whole line of road?

Mr. CULLOM. I will touch upon that subject briefly in what I have to say, and shall answer the Senator from Oregon in the course of my remarks.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I am inquiring for information. I have not yet made up my mind as to the construction of this bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I am not objecting to the Senator's inquiry. I was going to say that I shall discuss that point briefly in what I say; but in answer to the Senator I have this to say now: that the words "substantially similar circumstances and conditions" are words of very great importance, and words which may be taken for what they say by a court or by a commission who may have something to do with the construction of the law. Whether the section should be construed so as to give relief as to the water point of competition that the Senator refers to, or not, the section itself does provide that at such a competing point, if the fact does exist, the interstate commission shall have the power to give relief upon a showing of the proper state of facts.

Mr. HOAR. The power of suspension is given in a special case.

Mr. CULLOM. And of course every case of the kind would be a special case, if, in the judgment of the commission, it was deemed necessary to relieve the railroad company at that particular competing point from the operation of the law.

Mr. HARRIS. It does not refer to one single shipment, but to the establishment of a rule by the commission.

Mr. CULLOM. Of course a rule applying to all alike.

Mr. HOAR. I will put an illustration. The port of Boston, in Massachusetts, has a foreign commerce of about $125,000,000 annually. It was larger than that three or four years ago, but the change is not in the amount of commerce, but in the value of the articles exported and imported. That was the amount last year. Now, probably, of the exports, which are seventy odd millions of dollars, between thirty and forty millions consist of cotton, cattle, wheat, corn, hams and bacon, and lard—the food products of the West and the cotton of the South.

Every ton of that produce exported to-day I suppose is taken from a place in the country which is from 150 to 250 miles nearer to New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. Now, the railroads give a rebate of five per cent. on all those exported articles. On that export trade of course depends a corresponding import trade, which otherwise we should not get at that port.

Have we got, under this bill, to put down all the local business of Massachusetts, the cotton which is taken to her factories to be used there and the food products which are brought to feed her people, to the New York rates, that is to the rates of carriers who do not have to carry the goods so far by 250 miles; or have we got to give up that export trade; or is this great export trade of the second commercial city of the country to depend on whether five commissioners happen to think that is or is not a special case?

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, it may be said to be rather unfortunate that Boston is a little farther away from the center of gravity than New York; but I do not think, myself, that there is anything in this bill which prohibits a railroad from carrying to Boston just as cheaply as it carries to New York from Chicago or Omaha or San Francisco, and there is not anything now that prevents it.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think the Senator quite apprehends the force of my statement. The bill does not make New York a comparison; but does it not say that a company shall not carry over the same line of road to other points in Massachusetts the same article at a larger price than it charges this foreign commerce—that is the proposition—unless the commissioners come in and make an exception? Then the railroads have got to put down the whole railroad transportation in cotton and food products in Massachusetts along their lines to the New York rates if they put down the exports from Boston to the New York rates, and that they can not do under the laws of trade, because, of course, the other road, which is 250 miles nearer, has the advantage.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as this section is concerned, when a load of corn, wheat, cattle, or what not, is started from Chicago, there is nothing in this bill that prohibits the transportation company taking the product in a car from Chicago at exactly the same rate to Boston that it takes it to New York—not a single line. The only question, then, is a question as to whether the railroads will carry the products as cheaply to Boston as to New York. In my own judgment they will.

Mr. HOAR. My friend does not still answer the question. Do you not prohibit them from carrying it to Boston at a less rate than they carry it to Springfield, or Worcester, or Fall River, or to any other point on the line in Massachusetts?

Mr. CULLOM. At a less rate, yes.

Mr. HOAR. That is exactly the point. We have got, therefore, have we not, under your bill to put down Worcester and Springfield and Fall River to the New York rate, or else Boston can not have the exports?

Mr. CULLOM. Has the Senator any objection to having the rate put down? Is there any reason why the rates to New York and Boston should not be the same?

Mr. HOAR. The roads can not live at those rates. My friend has got in his bill the general provision that they shall not charge anything more than what is reasonable to those places. You have got the thing down under the operation of your bill to what is reasonable as an independent proposition.

Mr. CULLOM. Has the Senator any objection to that?

Mr. HOAR. Of course not. You have got it down to what is reasonable; now stop there. Then the railroad company says, "While I am doing this business for all New England, for all its local uses of every sort, food supply or supply of materials, at a reasonable rate and no more, which I am bound to do, I can, in connection with that business, take on, in addition, at 5 per cent. rebate, these thirty millions which are going to Europe, if you let me; but if you say I shall not do that unless I put local rates for all Massachusetts at 5 per cent. below what is reasonable for them, I can not live, and the whole business must go to New York." That is the proposition.

Now, a man doing a business of transportation at a fair rate, a reasonable rate, and no more, may very often afford to take a particular piece of merchandise or merchandise for a particular destination at very much less than his usual rates. If the Senator should engage to take me with a hack over to Bladensburg this morning and charge me $10 for it, and that was a reasonable price and no more, and he should come across a man who was on his way there with a carpet-bag in his hand about to walk, and the man says, "I have got but a dollar in my pocket and I will give you that," and he takes him on, that does not do me any injustice, it does not do him any injustice, and it does not cause any loss. That is the attitude of the foreign commerce of every principal port.

What I want to know of the Senator now is, not to debate this matter, but to ascertain the meaning of the bill. Do I correctly understand him as saying that the right to continue that foreign commerce, in which the condition is what I have stated, to be dependent in the future, under the act of Congress, on the opinion of five commissioners? More than that, is that foreign commerce to stop for a while, to be revived again a few months later, when the commission have organized and got around to this matter?

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, it is pretty difficult to pass any act providing for any regulation whatever that may not appear to harshly interfere with what somebody is doing. Now, so far as I am concerned, I have no disposition to interfere with the foreign commerce of this country. I would very much prefer to see the foreign commerce increase, if it can be done consistent with the protection of the great masses of the people of this country outside of the seaports.

But here we are met with this condition of affairs—unjust discrimination, extortion, secret rebates, and all manner of unjust practices have been going on for years by the railroad corporations of this country because there has been no regulation of them by the Government of the United States. Now we come in with a bill that undertakes, in a moderate degree I think, to apply to them some sort of regulation. We say that there shall be no secret rebates; we say that there shall be no unjust discrimination; we say that there shall be no extortion. Then we come with the fourth section and say that there shall not be a greater charge for the shorter than for the longer distance over the same line under substantially similar circumstances, the shorter being included within the longer, and the property, of course, being of like kind.

Now, how are we ever going to regulate these railroads? The Senator from Massachusetts steps in and says that is going to interfere with the trade of Boston; it is going to stop the export trade and the import trade that is going on at the city of Boston. I do not know whether it will do so or not, but I do not believe it will because those words, as I said awhile ago, "under like conditions and circumstances," are words that the commission, that the railroad men, that the courts are bound to construe in the most liberal manner consistent with the actual honest commerce of this country.

I undertake to say that you can not pass any bill which will in any way restrict the traffic carried on by corporations unless you have something that will in some way appear to interfere with localities or with individual interests which are being carried on. I believe myself that those words "under similar conditions and circumstances" will open a way, if any way is necessary to be opened, so that the real commerce that is being conducted by Boston or New York or Philadelphia or any other seaport will go on without the slightest interruption. I do not believe that the Senator will find that his constituents in the city of Boston will be in the slightest degree interrupted in their foreign commerce which they are carrying on to-day, even if the very letter of the law should be enforced as the fourth section declares.

But I do not believe it will be enforced as the letter of it reads in all cases, but that a proper and liberal construction will be given by the courts and by the commission and by the railroads themselves to the words I have referred to. My own judgment is that if the common carriers of this country proceed right along in the discharge of their honest duties as common carriers and construe those words liberally so that they may carry the products of the West to the city of Boston to be transported to the people on the other side of the water, there will be no interference with that work by the commission, by the courts, or by anybody else. But if we are going to regulate these corporations at all, if we are going to stop unjust discriminations and the secret rebates by which towns are built up and towns are destroyed, by which individuals are destroyed and individuals are built up, we must have something in the bill which will mean something, or else we might as well lay the bill on the table and go at other business.

The limitations placed upon the prohibition that is made are very significant, and they must not be overlooked. They require that in determining the sum that may be charged for a shorter as compared with a longer distance, the comparison must be made—

1. Between shipments "of like kind of property."
2. "Under substantially similar circumstances and conditions."
3. "Over the same line."
4. "In the same direction."
5. When the shorter is "included within the longer distance."

When the act is to be applied in any given case to measure the charge that may be made for any distance, as compared with a longer distance, all of these limitations must be taken into account, and they must all apply to the case—not three or four of them, but all of them. The first, fourth, and fifth of these limitations do not appear to call for any explanation, but the meaning of the second and third may need some explanation.

As I understand them, the words "circumstances and conditions" mean the conditions that govern railway traffic, and the circumstances under which it is transported. To my mind these words are full of meaning. They comprehend all the circumstances and conditions that may justify differences in rates, such as competition with other railroads and with water routes, the volume and character of business at different points, the difference in terminal expenses, and the cost of service in each case. If the words used were "the same circumstances and conditions," ingenious railway gentlemen would be able to show that the circumstances and conditions were never exactly the same in any two cases. And they might also be able to show that they were not "similar," if that was the word used. But the words "substantially similar" impart enough latitude to the comparison to enable the courts to exercise a sound discretion and common sense in passing upon cases that may arise.

So far as any one railroad company is concerned, therefore, the sum which it may charge for a haul from one end of its railroad to the other end becomes the maximum amount it can charge for any shorter haul over that road in the same direction and under substantially similar circumstances and conditions when the shorter distance is included within the longer.

But the question that seems to trouble those who object to the section as it stands is, whether the maximum thus fixed is the sum which a railroad company charges upon shipments originating at and destined to points upon its own road, or whether the maximum is the sum which it accepts as its share of a through rate upon shipments passing over its road which originate at or are destined to points upon another road. It seems clear to me that there can be but one answer to that question.

In the first place, the measure of the charge that may be made for the shorter distance is the sum that is charged for a longer distance over the same line and under substantially similar circumstances and conditions. The rates fixed by a railroad company between points upon its own road are clearly rates upon one line, or, in the terms of the bill, the "same line." A railroad company can make and control the rates upon its own road, and the section says that in making such rates the short-haul principle shall be observed. A railroad company can not control rates over the road of another company. But when two or more companies unite in making joint rates over their respective roads, they become in the eye of this bill one line, and this section says that the short-haul principle must be observed in making rates over that line, the two or more roads composing it being, within the meaning of the section, the same line so far as such joint rates are concerned. The word railroad is used throughout the bill and the word line is used only in this section. The courts will be bound to assume that the word line means something different from the word railroad, or it would not have been used in this one instance when the word railroad would naturally have been used if something different had not been intended. The word line means a railroad or a combination of railroads. It means a route. Section 7 of the bill requires the carriage of freights to be "treated as one continuous carriage from the place of shipment to the place of destination," and this could not be done in the case of shipments over connecting roads if the word used in this section was "railroad," instead of "line."

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator a question, if he will allow me.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator wish to be understood as saying that it is the meaning of this bill that the long and short haul provision does not apply; that is, that the circumstances are not substantially similar, where one of the points is a competing point and where one is not?

Mr. CULLOM. I mean to say simply this: You take one railroad, if you please, between the city of Washington and the city of New York; that railroad makes its schedule of rates and it publishes, under this bill, that schedule of rates, and so far as its operation on its own road, not in connection with other lines or roads, but on its own road, it is not at liberty to charge more for a shorter distance on that road between here and New York under like circumstances and conditions than it charges from here to New York.

Mr. GEORGE. But the point is this: I understood the Senator to say—and that is what I want to have settled—that if one point from which the shipment is made is a competitive point, either by having a competing railroad or by having water transportation, and the other point from which the shipment is made is not a competitive point, then the circumstances are not substantially similar.

Mr. CULLOM. I do say the facts should be considered.

Mr. GEORGE. Then let me say, that if I believed that that was the meaning of the bill and the courts would assent to it, I would vote against it, because with that construction upon those words the whole provision in the bill in reference to the long and short haul amounts to nothing.

Mr. CULLOM. If it does not amount to anything, it will not hurt anybody.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not want to hurt anybody, but to save somebody by a substantial provision on that subject.

Mr. CULLOM. So do I; but I do not want to humbug anybody either. The Senate, however, by a deliberate vote placed in the bill which was passed by the Senate during last session these words, "under like circumstances and conditions," and did it, the select committee not having reported those words to the Senate in the original bill.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not object to the words. I object to the interpretation which you put upon them. I do not believe that is the true and legal interpretation, and I protest that this bill shall go through here with an authoritative exposition or interpretation of the meaning of these words given them by the Senator. If that be the meaning I am against it.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Mississippi has a right to put whatever construction on those words he chooses, and of course he will do so; but I say, not as the chairman of the committee, but simply as a Senator upon this floor, that those words were put in there by this Senate after the select committee had failed to report them, and they were put there because the original section reported by the committee was too rigid and it was feared that it would interfere with the general commerce of the country, and when they were put there they were put there to mean something, and they do mean something.

They mean just what they say, that you shall not charge more for the shorter than for the longer distance on the same line in the same direction under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, and those conditions and circumstances may be, if you please, the fact that one place is a competing point and that another place is not, the fact that one place furnishes a large amount of business and the way-station does not furnish perhaps more than a car-load, and that it incurs additional expense and all that sort of thing. No court, no commission, and no lawyer can afford to say that those words do not mean anything when they are put in there.

Mr. GEORGE. With that construction of it, I think the Senator gives away all the beneficial part of the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator does no such thing. The fact to-day is—and I want the Senator from Mississippi to hear it——

Mr. GEORGE. I will listen.

Mr. CULLOM. The fact to-day is that there is an utter disregard by the railroads of the country of the circumstance that there are thousands and tens of thousands of shipments made under exactly similar circumstances and conditions where one is discriminated against and another is not, where one place is broken down and another is not, where one man gets rebate and another does not; and the purpose of this bill is to prevent that, in so far as we may be able to do it, without crippling the commerce of the country. Does not the Senator think there is something in it?

Mr. GEORGE. I think there is a good deal in the provision against discrimination and the provision against rebates, but I think that by the construction put upon the clause as to the long and short haul the Senator has destroyed the benefit of that provision.

Mr. CULLOM. The joint through rates, which are made by two or more railroad companies between points upon their respective roads, are made over an entirely different and distinct line from that over which any one of the companies individually makes rates. And they are also made under different "circumstances and conditions" from those which govern and determine rates made over a single railroad.

The two transactions are separate and distinct, neither being necessarily governed by the other. Furthermore, the making of joint through rates is specifically recognized by the bill in the section requiring publicity of rates, and nowhere in the bill can anything be found in relation to the division of a joint rate by connecting roads. I am satisfied, therefore, that the only construction that is warranted by the language of the section is the one I have given it, and that, instead of requiring rates to be measured by the percentage of a through rate which a road accepts, or of requiring through rates over connecting roads to be an aggregation of the local rates over each road, as some have claimed, the section as it stands simply requires that each railroad company shall observe the short-haul principle as to its own rates, and that the same principle shall also be observed by a combination of railroads as to the joint through rates between points upon their respective roads agreed upon by such a combination.

I have received a copy of the New York Times of the 5th instant, containing a long argument against this section by Mr. George R. Blanchard, commissioner of the Central Traffic Association. Mr. Blanchard is a very able man, and has a peculiar faculty for discovering practical difficulties that may arise under this bill. If his questions can be answered satisfactorily, as I think they can be, I feel sure that the bill can stand the test of practical operation reasonably well. In this letter Mr. Blanchard addresses some questions to me, which I will endeavor to answer in order. In discussing the meaning of the short-haul section Mr. Blanchard says:

Traffic is received at Fort Wayne:

1. From the Wabash Railway coming from Kansas City. This allows the lowest rate east of Fort Wayne.
2. From the nearer connecting Grand Rapids road. This allows more rate east of Fort Wayne.
3. From resident forwarders. This allows the highest rate east of Fort Wayne. It is a frequent happening that there comes to Fort Wayne, on the same day, one car from each of these sources, none of them being handled by the railways, (because the town grain comes from an elevator), and that the three cars go in the same train from Fort Wayne to the same consignee at New York, but at the said three different rates. It is therefore all transported out of Fort Wayne under substantially like conditions. Will Senator CULLOM kindly answer the following:

1. Would the transportation circumstances and conditions be substantially the same?
2. Is or is not the same rate required from Fort Wayne on the three cars, and if not, what difference may prevail?
3. Does this refer to commercial circumstances and conditions by which each point of origin is to be considered as changing them?
4. His original bill defined this looseness by saying "from the same original points of departure, or to the same point of arrival." How is it to be read now?

My answer to the first question is that, in the case stated by Mr. Blanchard, the transportation circumstances and conditions would not be the same as to the three cars in question, because one shipment originated at Kansas City, another on the Grand Rapids road, and another at Fort Wayne.

The second question is: "Is or is not the same rate required from Fort Wayne on the three cars; and if not, what difference may prevail?"

In answer, I say that the same rate or charge is not, in my opinion, necessarily required from Fort Wayne on each of the three cars, because they do not pass "over the same line" from point of shipment to place of destination within the meaning of the bill. The line from Kansas City to New York must observe the short-haul rule, and must not charge more from Fort Wayne than from the first point on that line west of Fort Wayne to which that particular combination of carriers makes joint through rates. The combination of carriers making joint rates from points on the Grand Rapids road to New York must observe the same rule. The shipment originating at Fort Wayne would be governed by the charge made from the next point west of Fort Wayne on the road between Fort Wayne and New York. The same rule must be observed in all these transactions as to each separate line, but the differences between the amounts actually received for the haul from Fort Wayne to New York in each case must depend upon the circumstances in each case.

I think Mr. Blanchard's third and fourth questions are sufficiently answered by what I have already said. In the same letter he propounds several questions to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] which I desire to notice. He quotes the following statement which the Senator is reported to have made:

> When the Boston and Albany, New York Central, and Lake Shore combine and fix a through rate from Boston to Chicago, they can not charge more between Boston and Buffalo than the aggregate charge. That gives a wide latitude. It allows a charge of as much for 50 miles as for 500, though no more.

So far as the fourth section is concerned, the Senator from Iowa is reported to have said it.

Mr. Blanchard then asks: "How can the rate from Boston to Chicago be charged to Buffalo?"

My answer is that, if the combination of carriers named by the Senator agrees upon and publishes a schedule of joint rates between Boston and Chicago, the charge made to Buffalo must not exceed the sum charged to Chicago, but it may be the same, so far as this short-haul section is concerned. The prohibition made by this section is simply against charging more in the aggregate to Buffalo than to any point beyond Buffalo on the line composed of the three roads named. The charge to Buffalo must not exceed the amount charged to Chicago; but that is not all. It must not exceed the charge to any point between Buffalo and Chicago to which the combination composed of these three carriers makes joint rates.

If the charge to any of the intermediate points is less than the charge to Chicago, such smaller sum becomes the maximum amount that can be charged to Buffalo instead of the Chicago charge. This is as far as the short-haul section affects the charge to Buffalo. When a question is raised as to the right of the carriers to charge as much to Buffalo as to Chicago or to the next point west of Buffalo, that must be determined by the commission and the courts under the requirements of the bill that all rates must be reasonable and that no unreasonable preference must be given to any particular locality.

Mr. Blanchard's second question is: "Why is it the rate to Chicago rather than to Cleveland or Omaha which may be charged from Boston to Buffalo, and why is it any of them?"

It is to be presumed that under the requirements of the bill such joint through rates as those under consideration would be established and made public by the carriers. The illustration said to have been given by the Senator from Iowa referred to shipments over a line from Boston to Chicago composed of three railroads. The charge to Omaha does not govern the rates made on that particular line, because Omaha is not on "the same line."

The charge made to Buffalo must not exceed the charge to Chicago, nor to Toledo, nor to Cleveland, nor to Erie, nor to the first point west of Buffalo on that line to which the three carriers named make joint rates. In this case the first requirement of the short-haul section is that the charge to Buffalo shall not exceed the charge to Chicago, which would be the largest amount that could be charged. But the maximum would be decreased as the charges to points between Buffalo and Chicago decreased, so that the smallest sum charged to any point beyond Buffalo would really become the maximum amount that could be charged to Buffalo.

Again, Mr. Blanchard asks:

> If they can charge as much from Boston to Buffalo as three lines combined may charge from the same or further points to Chicago, why can not the charge be as much as six lines combined from Boston to San Francisco?

There is nothing in the short-haul section standing by itself that would prevent the same charge being made from Boston to Buffalo that is made from Boston to San Francisco, if we can assume that no smaller charge is made to any point between Buffalo and San Francisco. When the six carriers combine to make joint rates between Boston and San Francisco they become a different line, and not the line that we were talking about or that the Senator from Iowa is charged with having talked about, from Boston to Chicago. The charge this different combination could make to Buffalo would be limited first by its charge to San Francisco, then by its charge to Ogden if that was less, then by its charge to Omaha if that was less, then by its charge to Chicago if that was less, and finally by the lowest charge made to any point west of Buffalo to which this combination of six carriers made and published joint rates.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois for an explanation of the effect of the bill. Suppose the Boston and Albany Railroad takes freight at Albany for Boston from different lines from the West—freight from Chicago on one line, freight from Saint Louis on another, freight from Cleveland on another, and freight from Kansas City on another—if the Boston and Albany makes a different charge for the freight that it takes off from one of these lines on its way to Boston than it does from any other line, does it not subject itself to the prosecution set up in your bill?

Mr. CULLOM. I have just been discussing the very points the Senator raises.

Mr. DAWES. Probably I was out of the Senate chamber.

Mr. CULLOM. However, I have no objection to the Senator asking the question, because I want to be perfectly fair about this matter. I have undertaken to show that a line of railroad may be one line doing business by itself, having its tariff of rates for its own use, and it can control them, and that one road shall not be at liberty to charge more for the shorter than for the longer distance on the same line, in the same direction, and under the same circumstances, &c. Now, you can make a line of a dozen roads, for instance, as I said, from San Francisco to Boston, and the same rule applies as to that line, that it shall not be allowed to charge more for the shorter than for the longer distance, and so on, under similar circumstances. Suppose there are four roads coming into Buffalo. I believe that is the place the Senator named?

Mr. DAWES. No, Albany. I will explain to the Senator that Albany is where the Boston and Albany road begins. It is an independent line from there to Boston, and being in two States it is subject to all the penalties of your bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand. Suppose there are four roads coming to Albany, and each one of them does business with the Albany and Boston road. At the other end of its line, if you please, each one of them has its arrangements of through rates, by which, from Kansas City, the Wabash, for instance, carries freight to Albany, and on to Boston on that line; another road from Chicago carries freight from Chicago to Albany and on to Boston on that line; another one from Detroit carries freight to Albany and on to Boston on that line.

Mr. DAWES. If you will allow me right there——

Mr. CULLOM. Do not interrupt me while I am in the middle of an explanation.

Mr. DAWES. I beg pardon.

Mr. CULLOM. Each one of these different roads makes its own combination, its own arrangements with the Boston and Albany by which grain or other products are transported over its line from Albany to Boston; and the charge that the Albany and Boston road makes, or the agreement that it makes, if you please, with these different, separate lines has nothing to do with what it charges one or the other of them, and it has nothing to do with its own local rates from Albany to Boston.

Mr. HOAR. Except under the clause as to unjust discrimination.

Mr. CULLOM. Except under the clause relative to unjust discrimination. As I said before, the Albany and Boston road can have an arrangement with the Wabash by which grain is brought from Kansas City to Boston over its line at just whatever rate the Wabash line can agree upon, and so with each of the others.

Mr. DAWES. And they can charge a different rate?

Mr. CULLOM. They can carry the freight as they may agree to carry it, and whatever their agreement may be, it does not affect the freight that goes from Albany to Boston on that line, its own line, according to its own published rates of freight.

Mr. DAWES. Suppose it be a different rate from that for which it takes up freight at Albany and carries it to Boston?

Mr. CULLOM. It does not make the slightest difference in the world; it has nothing to do with it. One is a line of railroad by itself; the other is a line of railroad in conjunction with one, two, or five others, if you please, and the one rate does not control the others. In other words, as I have said over and over again, the percentage that the Boston and Albany road gets for carrying the products that are brought from the far west to Boston after they reach Albany has nothing to do with regulating the rates from Albany to Boston over that road.

Mr. DAWES. Do you find that in the letter of your bill, or do you think that ought to be the construction of it?

Mr. CULLOM. I think that is a reasonable construction of the bill, and I have no question myself but that the courts and the commission would construe it that way. The letter of the bill will sustain that construction of it, I think.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is of the utmost importance that we as well as the business community should understand the construction the committee put upon this bill. I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois one or two questions in this connection, so that we may understand fully just what the committee understand to be the meaning of this section.

As I understand him, if a combination of roads agree to carry freight from San Francisco to New York at $1 a hundred pounds, that rate is the only limitation which that particular transaction makes upon any intermediate rates between San Francisco and New York. Do I understand that to be the Senator's construction?

Mr. CULLOM. Ask that question again.

Mr. ALDRICH. In the case of a contract for the transportation of freight from San Francisco to New York at an agreed rate of $1 per 100 pounds, that rate of $1 per 100 pounds is the only limitation which that transaction fixes upon any intermediate transportation or upon transportation between any intermediate points between San Francisco and New York?

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to answer that particular question of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ALDRICH. I was only trying to find out whether that was what the Senator from Illinois had stated. I understood him to state that.

Mr. HARRIS. The statement of the Senator from Illinois on that point, as I understood him—and I think I understood him clearly and correctly—was this: Here are four distinct and independent lines of railroad between New York and San Francisco; first, the Pennsylvania——

Mr. ALDRICH. I am talking about the same line. Take one of the lines.

Mr. HARRIS. There is a line composed of four distinct and independent lines.

Mr. ALDRICH. Take one of them.

Mr. HARRIS. It becomes one line by a contract and agreement between these four separate, distinct, and independent companies.

Now, to answer the question and to illustrate, assume that by contract upon the long line from New York to San Francisco, composed of four independent, distinct lines, becoming one by contract and agreement with the owners of these four lines for specific purposes and a specific character of freight, that line agrees to haul a car-load of grain or other freight from San Francisco to New York, say, for $100.

Mr. ALDRICH. One dollar per hundred pounds, I said.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well; but one hundred dollars illustrates the principle just as well, taking the freight by the car-load instead of a hundred pounds. Now, $100 is the through rate from San Francisco to New York. By agreement each of those four companies agrees to accept $25 apiece, making the hundred. If they agree only for through freights, if this agreement extends only for through freights from San Francisco to New York the hundred dollars a car-load would be the maximum long-haul charge, and it would be the maximum of any short-haul that passes over two or more of those roads. But suppose by contract the parties agree to carry from San Francisco to New York at $100 a car, from Ogden to New York at $75 a car, from Omaha to New York at $50 a car, then the rule would be from Ogden to New York, that is from any point east of Ogden to New York, they could not charge more than $75. The rule would be from Omaha to New York, from any point east of Omaha to New York, they could not charge more than $50.

Mr. ALDRICH. What I want to get at is the understanding of the committee. Could this same line charge $99 from Ogden, and from Omaha, and from Chicago, and from Cleveland, and from Buffalo to New York? So far as the limitations of the section are concerned, would they be allowed to charge $99 per car-load, say, from Buffalo to New York?

Mr. SPOONER. They must charge a reasonable rate.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understand the fourth section, so far as distance is concerned, it undertakes to fix what is a reasonable rate. That is another part of the bill; but this section of the bill, if I understand it at all, undertakes to construe the difference of distance into what is reasonable.

Mr. CULLOM. It does not do any such thing.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom? To the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish to continue my inquiry, but I am willing to listen to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me to suggest it to him, in as explicit terms as language will permit, each common carrier is not only authorized but required to classify and fix the rates upon the road.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is another section. I am speaking now about the provision of the fourth section and only the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I answer the declaration of the Senator that this bill would have to determine what was a reasonable rate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is there anything that does it, I ask, so far as this section of the bill is concerned? The Senator from Illinois does not understand it that way; and I resume, if the Senator pleases, and ask him to answer my question.

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. ALDRICH. I mean the Senator from Tennessee. My question is whether under the provision of this section there is anything which would prevent this same line from charging $99 a car (certainly it can not charge as much as $100) from each one of the points to which I have alluded.

Mr. HARRIS. If I was understood, I answered that question a few moments since, but I will repeat my answer, as I see that I, perhaps, was not understood. This long line becomes a distinctive carrier by contract, composed of four distinct and independent railroads. If the contract provides for the carrying of freight simply from San Francisco to New York and the contract stops there, it is a line for a specific purpose and for no other purpose.

Mr. ALDRICH. In other words, it is a contract.

Mr. HARRIS. And if that be true, then there is no reason to be found in this bill why they may not charge from any intermediate point up to the maximum, except that the charge must be reasonable.

Mr. ALDRICH. As I understand the Senator now, he says that that understanding and agreement constitutes a line of itself for through business from San Francisco to New York.

Mr. HARRIS. So it does.

Mr. ALDRICH. And that an agreement from Sacramento to New York would constitute a new line with the right to make a new contract not dependent upon the other. Is that true? I ask that question and I should like an answer.

Mr. HARRIS. If the contract fixes a different rate and a lower rate——

Mr. ALDRICH. It is another line. Does it constitute another line within the meaning of the bill which entitles them to make another and a different contract?

Mr. HARRIS. Upon the contrary, I think it is the same line created by contract and composed of four distinct lines.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose three of those four make a contract with their three roads, the Senator from Rhode Island wants to know whether that makes a different line, one line of the four roads and another of the three?

Mr. HARRIS. I can see no reason why three of the lines may not transact among themselves, for——

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator from Tennessee to say distinctly that a contract from San Francisco for through freight constituted that line a line only for that purpose, and that it did not put any limitation at all upon other contracts from intermediate points. What I want to find out is whether at Sacramento they would have a right to make a new contract, ignoring the provisions and limitations of the original contract from San Francisco.

Mr. HOAR. And make a new line and charge more?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; can they make a new line of three? That is the point I am coming at exactly. Here are between New York and San Francisco ten different railroad companies, who have joined in a contract which constitutes, according to the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Tennessee, a distinct, separate line from San Francisco to New York. Now is it a new line when nine of those join in that contract, and are they exempted from the provisions and limitations which apply to the line of ten companies; and if eight, if seven, if six, can each one of these companies make a new contract with new rates which have no limitations or relations to the nine or ten? That is what the Senator from Illinois said—that then you can fix your rates entirely separate and apart from the line. If these are separate and distinct lines, nine can charge more than ten; eight can charge more than ten; seven can charge more than ten, until you get down to two, and they can charge more than ten, and then you have only one line.

That is the point I was coming at exactly—whether each one of these various companies forming a line in itself was affected at all by the limitations which were fixed by a large combination that included the whole. I understood the Senator from Illinois to say distinctly they were not so bound, and that there was no limitation by this bill in the through rates upon smaller lines. For instance, if four roads between Chicago and New York charge one sum, it would not prevent three roads from Buffalo from charging twice as much, or three roads between Cleveland and New York from charging three times as much. It is not a question of business. I am trying to get at what construction the committee places on this section.

Mr. HARRIS. You mean three different roads from those I have mentioned as constituting the long line from San Francisco?

Mr. ALDRICH. No, I mean three of the same roads which made up the four in the original line.

Mr. HARRIS. Three of the same roads would not reach the same point; they would not reach San Francisco.

Mr. ALDRICH. They would reach an intermediate point.

Mr. HOAR. They are links in the same chain.

Mr. ALDRICH. They are three links of the same long chain which you have drawn out.

Mr. HARRIS. The case I put originally, it seems to me, clearly and distinctly answers the Senator's question. If this long line, being constituted with four separate, distinct, and independent lines, has contracted for through freights and for through freights only, I do not see that their contracts or the existence of that line would affect any other than the through shipments; but if in their contract constituting that long line composed of the four distinct lines they fix one rate from San Francisco to New York, another from Ogden to New York, another from Omaha to New York, or any of the intermediate points, including more than one of the lines to carry the freights, then the short-haul provision would apply to the maximum charge fixed by that agreement, fixed by that line upon which the freights were to be transported.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the question which I meant to ask the Senator from Tennessee in the first instance, and I think he has answered it now. It was, that if this constitutes one through line from San Francisco to New York, as I now understand him, they could fix a rate of $100 a car from San Francisco, and $99 a car from all the intermediate points under the provisions of this section of the bill.

Mr. CAMDEN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is that what the Senator from Tennessee meant to say?

Mr. HARRIS. If they provide for but one rate, and that an entire through rate, then the maximum charge of the through rate would be $100, and, so far as the fourth section is concerned, the maximum charge for the short haul could not exceed a hundred dollars.

Mr. ALDRICH. It could come anywhere within the whole charge?

Mr. HARRIS. Not exactly anywhere within the whole charge. That is to say, whenever you come to freights that begin and end on one line of road, that is, on one interstate railroad, then the rates fixed by that railroad apply, and not the rates fixed by contracts with any other roads.

Mr. STANFORD obtained the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I should like, with the leave of the Senator from California, to ask one question of the Senator from Tennessee. That is, whether he agrees with the Senator from Illinois that the mere destination, that is freight being carried to a foreign point or to a domestic point, the case I put to him, constitutes a difference of circumstances and conditions under this bill?

Mr. HARRIS. In answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, I desire to say to him that as a legislator I do not think it concerns me to determine the conclusion of fact as to what would constitute similar conditions and circumstances. That is a fact to be ascertained by the commission, if appealed to, or decided by the common carrier and to be complained of if he decides it incorrectly; and the commission will then investigate the question and determine whether the conditions and circumstances are similar in a given case put.

Mr. HOAR. But does the Senator mean to say that being able to maintain a great foreign commerce, millions upon millions, it ought to be dependent upon the opinion of the five commissioners and not to be fixed by the law-making power, so that in voting for this measure he has not an opinion as to whether that thing should continue?

Mr. HARRIS. I mean to say that whatever effect may be wrought upon any given commercial point by the establishment of a correct rule of transportation, the correctness and fairness and justice of the rule should determine it, and not the interest of the locality in question; and I mean to say in addition that it is very difficult, in my opinion, to establish the justice of a given carrier charging more for carrying a load of the same character of freight, and at the same time, and under substantially the same circumstances, over one-half of its road than it charges for carrying the same over the whole length of its line. If the adoption and maintenance of that rule shall work prejudice to the trade of any given locality, it is the misfortune of that locality, and it ought to be the misfortune of the locality and not made the misfortune of all the people who chance to live at non-competitive points along the line of the road.

Mr. HOAR. I can not see any misfortune to anybody else. It does not hurt the other people any.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from California let me ask the Senator from Tennessee just one more question?

Mr. STANFORD. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I desire to know whether he agrees with the Senator from Illinois that where in case the short haul is to a non-competitive point and the longer haul to a competitive point, that constitutes such a dissimilarity of circumstances and conditions as would allow the railroad company to charge a greater sum for the shorter haul?

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Rhode Island will pardon me. The Senator from Illinois made no such declaration.

Mr. ALDRICH. I certainly understood him to make exactly that declaration in answer to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALDRICH. Of course.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Illinois said that the question of conditions and circumstances necessarily would be taken into consideration as between the competitive and the non-competitive points. The Senator from Illinois gave no opinion upon the question as to what the decision should decide.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood him to make the statement I attributed to him.

Mr. CULLOM. While I am upon the floor I wish to say another thing. The Senator from Massachusetts objects to the construction of this subject being left in any degree to a commission.

Mr. HOAR. No; but that part of it.

Mr. CULLOM. I refer to the question whether the foreign commerce of the country should be interfered with or not. All I desire to say is that the best we can do is to pass the best bill we can, and it is for the commission and the railroads and the courts to construe it afterward. We are compelled to leave it to the common carriers and then to the commission, if one is created, and at last to the courts to determine what the proper construction of the law that we shall pass may be.

Mr. ALDRICH. As the Senator from Illinois says that he did not make that statement, I now ask him what his opinion is upon that question, if he has any, and I should like also to get the opinion of his colleagues on the committee.

Mr. CULLOM. I will simply say in answer to the Senator from Rhode Island that he seems to be exceedingly anxious to, in some way, make the bill which is before the Senate offensive to the people of this country; but I repeat that any court or any commission which had the construction of this section to pass upon would be required to take into account the language used, the place, the circumstances, and all together as to what those words should mean in determining whether a competitive point should have any advantage over a non-competitive point.

Mr. CAMDEN. If the Senator from Rhode Island will allow me I will answer his question.

Mr. ALDRICH. I desired an ex cathedra answer from the committee who made this report.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator wants my opinion he shall have exactly what I understand it to mean.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. HARRIS. I favored the short-haul provision from the beginning, and did so for this reason: As a general rule the shipper from a competitive point has a measure of protection, at least, by the competition that exists there.

Mr. ALDRICH. How if the shippers there can not get any lower rates?

Mr. HARRIS. But the shipper from a point non-competitive, where he must accept the terms of the carrier or allow his produce to perish upon his hands, is the shipper whom I wanted a short-haul law to protect.

Mr. CAMDEN. That is the very object of the provision.

Mr. HARRIS. That is the very object with me, at least, in having insisted from the moment I entered the interstate commerce committee, and I continue up to this moment and shall continue to insist upon a short-haul provision, so as to give the shipper from the non-competitive point some protection against unreasonable and unjust exactions; and for another reason: Take Chicago, for instance, as a competitive point. When rate wars may rage and drive through freights down to an unreasonable point, if the competing carriers there know that, however low they may put their rates from Chicago to New York, they can not charge an aggregate sum greater for any shorter haul between Chicago and New York, it will do more to restrain and to prevent rate wars than all your pooling contracts have ever done or will ever do.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator from Tennessee expect that those results will ever accrue from the passage of this bill?

Mr. HARRIS. The protection of the shipper from non-competitive points?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. HARRIS. I not only expect, but I am confident that it will accrue from this bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have received an answer, so far as the Senator from Tennessee is concerned, but I do not understand that the Senator from Illinois makes any answer to the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD] has the floor.

Mr. STANFORD. Mr. President, I shall speak to this bill as I understand it. In what I shall have to say upon the measure I shall endeavor to be entirely candid and correct. The importance of the subject is so great that it can only be permanently settled upon right principles. Anything else means renewed and continued disturbance. The bill under consideration provides for a regulation of one species of property not common to others. To see how far this is justifiable, it is well for us to consider the creation of railroads, and to understand how they are created.

Railroad companies are organized under the general laws of the different States. They have no exclusive privileges. They are associations aided by these general laws—laws of which every citizen, or any number of citizens, may avail themselves equally with those forming the railroad company. In the mere fact of association they may exist entirely without the aid of the State. The association is as natural as it is for one man to call in his neighbors to help him raise his barn, or to roll a saw-log, or to do any business not inconsistent with the rights of others. The State gives, by virtue of the incorporation laws, nothing to the incorporation. Whatever of capital or labor that is contributed to them is entirely private.

The ownership of the labor and capital provided is private; as much so as the banker's ownership of his money, the farmer's ownership of his farm, the teamster's ownership of his team, and so on.

It is private labor that builds the railroad from the first shovelful of dirt that is thrown until the last spike is driven and the road is ready for business; and then, when it is ready to operate, it is all the product of individual or private property.

But some will say the right of way was given. In regard to that I think there is much misapprehension. Those who desire to build a railroad, of course, must in some manner obtain the right of way on which to build it. They appeal to the State on the ground that the proposed investment is of a highly beneficial character to the public, and they ask the State to exercise its right of eminent domain in order that the road may be built. The State only can exercise the right of eminent domain for the benefit of the public, and then upon just compensation to be made to the owner for whatever is taken. The State could not take private property for the benefit of A, B, C, D, E, F, and others.

Now, up to this time everything in the railroad has come from private sources, and the labor belongs to the individuals as much as the labor of the man who tills a farm.

Control is the essence of ownership. The value of the property is its income-producing quality. This bill strikes at the control, and directly affects the income-producing capacity of the properties. Now, if the investment is legitimate, if its nature is so highly beneficial that the State can do, to aid its construction, what it could not do for the establishment of a factory or any other legitimate business, wherein is the reason for the interference with the values and the control of this property? No monopoly is given to it; it interferes with no rights previously existing, and is never used except when it offers advantages to the shipper or traveler superior to those existing before. If it is a monopoly it is only a beneficent one, cheapening and facilitating travel and commerce.

Now, if the State has given nothing to this railroad company but what it gives to every other citizen; if it has put no money in; if the company has no monopoly; if its services are necessarily of a beneficial character, why should the State interfere with its ownership and with its income-producing qualities? And if the State, or if Congress, impairs the value of this property, why should not compensation be made to the owners, and, before putting into operation a law that will affect values, ought not compensation to be made as is done when the Government exercises its right of eminent domain and condemns the property of A that the road may be built which the company pays for? By a reduction of income-producing qualities the value of the very right of way, which the railroad company has paid for, is affected.

The geography and topography of the country make competition a certainty. This bill denies to the railroad the right to charge less for the greater distance than for the shorter. I do not suppose that any railroad company ever carried freight or passengers for the longer distance for less than for the shorter unless competition, or some other circumstance beyond the control of the company, compelled. The only alternative would be to yield the business. It is a principle in good railroading to reject no business that offers if it can possibly be done, so long as it will pay the additional expense consequent upon its own movement. A very large portion of the traffic of the country is done below the average cost. The fixed expenses and the semi-fixed expenses of a railroad company are very large. They, as well as the operating expenses, are included to make the average cost of movement.

The average of operating expenses per ton is a very different figure from that of the average cost per ton, the latter including operating expenses, fixed expenses, and semi-fixed expenses. Thus, take the business from the Atlantic to the Pacific, or from the Pacific to the Atlantic, and we find competition by the Isthmus of Panama and competition by Cape Horn; we find overland routes of different length, of different grades and curves, varying in volume of business and in expenses of operating. We have very different average expense for movement. The longer road must compete with the shorter. The road with the heaviest gradients must compete with the road of easier. The road having a small volume of business must compete with the road having a large volume of business. The cost of fuel is a very important item, varying on the different railroads. Yet the road having the least volume of business, the road having the longest line, having the heaviest grades and curves, having the highest cost of fuel, will be in competition with and will have to carry as cheaply as one having the shortest line, the easiest gradients, the cheapest fuel, and the largest volume of business.

All these are factors that determine the rates at which the railroad may possibly do business, however meager the profits. All the overland lines of railroad find their rates very largely controlled or influenced by the routes by way of the Isthmus of Panama and of Cape Horn; meeting that competition, and being willing to accept a small profit where a larger can not be had, they carry along the line between the two extreme points the same character of freight at less rates than it is carried from east to west, or from west to east, to intermediate places. Thus, because of competition, freight going from New York to San Francisco may pass over the various lines of road making up a through line for, perhaps, half their regular rates, say from New York to Buffalo, from Buffalo to Chicago, from Chicago to Omaha, from Omaha to Salt Lake, and so on to destination on the Pacific coast. No profit is so small as to be despised. Business is done at that rate rather than not do it at all.

Take a more marked illustration. The Southern Pacific road strikes the Atlantic waters at a much less distance than any of its more northern competitors. It has a line of easy gradients comparatively, and it competes not only with its northern rivals, but more particularly with the Cape Horn and Isthmus of Panama routes, because of its shorter line and easy gradients. In this competition it often takes freight between the two oceans as low as $10, while it takes freight half way for, say, $30 a ton, a most reasonable rate for the limited local business of that country. Now, if it makes only a dollar net on the freight from San Francisco to New Orleans at $10, it is glad to make that dollar where it can get no more; but a ton of freight going to El Paso, something over half the distance, will pay $30 a ton. Now, if the freight at $10 to New Orleans pays $1 profit, the freight going a less distance, to El Paso, would pay as much profit as 21 tons going through to New Orleans; and the rates charged to El Paso are but fair, as is shown by the gross earnings and the gross expenses of the road, leaving but a very narrow net profit.

The shorter distance is not charged any more because of the less rate for the longer distance. Indeed the longer distance helps the railroad company to maintain itself, while without that help perhaps they could not do the shorter business at all. Is this Congress prepared to say that small earnings shall be despised, that they shall not be secured when greater can not be had? Are they prepared to deny to individual shippers and communities the benefit of their more favorable location, whether made so because of the geography and topography of the country or by artificial means? It is the misfortune of some places not to be so well located and not the fault of the more favorable places that nature or art has given them superior advantages. It seems to me that Congress might with equal propriety deny the shipper the right to avail himself of these natural or artificial advantages as to deny to the railroad the right to avail itself of opportunities to meet competition.

There is a class of freight that can stand only a certain charge. A greater charge becomes prohibitory. A very large part of the unmanufactered raw material of this country belongs to this class, paying a trifle over the additional cost consequent upon its movement, developing a business that may pay better, and giving its small portion of net profit above the cost of movement towards the large items of fixed and semi-fixed expenses. Whether a road is doing a profitable business or not is not determined by the percentage of operating expenses. Thus a road carrying valuable goods and doing a small business may find its percentage of operating expenses upon the amount earned very small, whereas, if there could be thrown upon it in addition a large business of cheap transportation, its earnings would be larger, but the per cent. of operating expenses would be increased; and to the extent that there was a net earning on this cheap class of freight just so far the company would be benefited. The long haul at cheap competing rates is really beneficial to the short haul at non-competing rates. It may be that neither alone would maintain the road. If I understand this bill correctly, under it the long lines of railroad passing through different States will have to give up one or the other. It will be practically a regulation of freight within the boundaries of a State and making a barrier at the boundary of a State to the free transmission of commerce.

Since the first road was built in the United States up to this time the railroads have substantially fixed their own rates for service, until to-day the rate is such as was not dreamed of as possible twenty years ago, nor was it believed possible even ten years ago. The whole country is developed. No product has suffered for want of movement. The general railroad management of the country is careful to consider what the cheap unmanufactured products of the country can afford to pay, and make their rates with a view that production shall not be hindered. The rates charged for manufactured goods, almost without an exception, do not affect the producer or the consumer. If the rates of freight upon manufactured articles were reduced one-half the probability is that there is nothing that moves by railroad over the longest line in the country whose price to the consumer would be affected or would be taken into consideration by the manufacturer; but the fractional part of a cent becomes a serious consequence in the long haul to most of the raw products of the country. The higher the maximums the lower the possible minimums.

Thus, in my own State, the maximum rates were 15 cents per ton per mile. With an average cost of 2 cents a mile for movement, which was about the average at one time, 1 ton of freight moved at 15 cents a ton per mile, would enable the railroad to move 14 tons at the minimum rate of 1 cent a ton per mile. There was at that time about 1 per cent. of the business done at the maximum rate, while the other 99 per cent. was done at rates governed by circumstances and influences which the railroad company could not control.

This bill seems to me not only to deny competition by railroads, which exist almost throughout the length and breadth of the country, but to exhibit a tendency to foster water ways to the positive discouragement of the railroad interests. If it aimed but to insure the water lines of communication against the competition of rails, I do not know how a bill could be framed to secure that object better than this one. If railroading is a legitimate business, and if it is only the aggregate of the private property contributed by the stockholders; if it is maintained and operated by the labor of individuals, what justification there can be for depriving the owners of control, and the property of its full earning capacity within the laws as they existed at the time of the original investments, I am unable to see. It seems to me, clearly, it is a violation of the rights of property, and the rights of the laborer to receive a compensation for services performed.

It is also a discouragement of this class of investments. The railroads up to this time have received the peculiar indorsement of being of such a highly beneficial character that the State could exercise the right of eminent domain to the end that the road might be built. If this bill shall become a law its consequences will be most disastrous, in my judgment, to the varied business interests of the country. When you think that most of the products of the country pass one or more times over its railroads, of the many thousands of people who are engaged in their operation, the many more thousands whose calling depends upon these roads, and the vast volume of business and its great value that moves over them, it seems to me that Congress ought to consider with great care how far these investments, these industries of all kinds, may be disturbed. That they will be largely disturbed it seems to me must be plain to the dullest comprehension. While the railroad companies have practically been as free to manage their business under the common law as those engaged in other callings the country has prospered, accommodations have been given and are given that promote the prosperity of every industry. There has been no taking of property without compensation, no control without ownership, and the anarchists in the history of the country have thus far found little justification in the example of the Government for violent taking of property. There can be no valid objection to police regulation, but only to that attempted regulation which goes to and affects values directly and inevitably.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SABIN. If the Senator will allow me, I desire permission to offer an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. CAMERON. I withdraw the motion for the present.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SABIN and Mr. VEST submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VEST submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3001) for the erection of a public building at Milwaukee, Wis., reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1322) to provide for the construction of a public building at the city of Morgan City (port of Brashear), State of Louisiana, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2539) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange property purchased at Abingdon, Va., as a site for a public building, for more suitable property, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7218) to amend an act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Chattanooga, Tenn.," approved February 25, 1885, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 191) providing for the erection of a public building at Los Angeles, Cal., reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2908) for the erection of a public building at Charleston, S. C., reported it with amendments.

Mr. MAHONE. I am also instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2675) for the completion of a public building at Santa Fé, N. Mex., to ask that it be indefinitely postponed, a bill having already passed the Senate covering the same purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. MAHONE. I am also directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1646) to amend an act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Chattanooga, Tenn.," approved February 25, 1885, to ask the same disposition for the same reason.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, there being no objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 3111) for the relief of the legal personal representatives of Henry H. Sibley, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMDEN introduced a bill (S. 3112) for the relief of Samuel C. Ludington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS introduced a bill (S. 3113) making appropriation to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire and extinguish outstanding titles into and upon property occupied by the Treasury Department in San Francisco, Cal., and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills this day received from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 527) for the relief of William Pike;

A bill (H. R. 529) for the relief of George W. Baldwin, Charles L. Baldwin, and Dora Thompson;

A bill (H. R. 3365) for the relief of the heirs or legal representative of Samuel H. Moer; and

A bill (H. R. 5535) for the relief of Washington L. Parvin and Henry A. Greene.

The bill (H. R. 4594) for the relief of John R. Harrington was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 72) to provide for the settlement of accounts with the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

The bill (H. R. 5894) for the relief of Elon A. Marsh and Minard Lafever was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

LOUISE AMBRECHT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1201) granting a pension to Louise Ambrecht; which was, in line 4, to strike out the word "surgeon" and insert "sergeant."

The amendment was concurred in.

ELIZABETH WARD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2587) granting a pension to Elizabeth Ward; which was, in line 6, to strike out "one hundred" and to insert "fifty."

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1844) granting a pension to Orrin P. Cooley, which was, in line 3, to strike out all after the word "volunteers" to the end of the bill, and to insert in lieu thereof:

Subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The amendment was concurred in.

COL. CHARLES E. CAPEHART.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1481) granting an increase of pension to Col. Charles E. Capehart, which was, in line 6, to strike out "fifty" and to insert "forty-five."

Mr. SAWYER. I move concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

ISAAC RANSOM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2334) granting a pension to Isaac Ransom, which was, in line 5, to strike out the words "for such diseases as now exist."

The amendment was concurred in.

JAMES E. ABBS.

Mr. SAWYER. I move to indefinitely postpone the bill (S. 2883) granting a pension to James E. Abbs, it being Order of Business No. 1844. It is a pension bill; but the pension has been allowed at the Pension Office since the bill was reported, and consequently I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

TRUST FUND OF DELAWARE INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of 22d ultimo from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draft of proposed legislation prepared in the Office of Indian Affairs, providing for the per capita payment to the Delaware Indians, resident in the Cherokee Nation in Indian Territory, of the amount of their trust fund, principal and interest, held by the Government of the United States by virtue of the several treaties with the said Delaware Indians.

The matter is presented for the consideration and action of Congress.

TARIFF DUTIES ON FISH.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a reply of the Secretary of the Treasury to the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 14, 1886, calling for an interpretation of the tariff law respecting the duties on fish; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. REESE, for ten days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska, indefinitely, on account of important business.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CAMDEN, N. J.

Mr. HIRES. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 228) for the erection of a public building at Camden, N. J., and that the same be now considered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the post-office, custom-house, and internal-revenue and other Government offices, at the city of Camden, N. J. The plans, specifications, and full estimates of said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $100,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of New Jersey shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owners thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds recommended the following amendment:

After the word "therein," at the end of said bill, insert the following:

"Nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site, nor plan for said building, shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $100,000 for site and building."

Mr. BURROWS. Is this a Senate bill?

The SPEAKER. It is. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HIRES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN F. CHAMBERLIN.

Mr. CURTIN. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 208) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant a permit to John F. Chamberlin to erect a hotel upon the lands of the United States at Fortress Monroe, Va., and that the same be now considered.

The joint resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. LIBBEY. I object.

Mr. CURTIN. I trust the gentleman will not object to the resolution. It is for the benefit of his constituents.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT IN OREGON.

Mr. HERMANN. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1999) to establish an additional land district in the State of Oregon, and that the same be now considered.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COBB. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the regular order.

HON. D. WYATT AIKEN.

Mr. DIBBLE. I desire, as a matter of privilege, to present the oath of office sworn and subscribed by Hon. D. WYATT AIKEN, a Representative from South Carolina, and I accompany it with the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas D. WYATT AIKEN, Representative for the State of South Carolina from the third district thereof, has been unable from sickness to appear in person to be sworn as a member of this House, but has sworn to and subscribed the oath of office before an officer authorized by law to administer oaths, and the said oath of office has been presented in his behalf to the House: Therefore, Resolved, That the said oath be accepted and received by the House as the oath of office of the said D. WYATT AIKEN as a Member of this House.

Mr. DIBBLE. At the beginning of the first session of the present Congress Mr. AIKEN was in a state of health which prevented him from appearing before this House to be sworn in at that time. He passed through Washington to Baltimore and was under the advice of physicians there and had the prospect of being able to be here in the course of three or four weeks. Contrary to his expectation he did not recover from the rheumatic or sciatic affection from which he suffered, and he has been unable from that time forward to undergo the personal exertion of appearing before the House to be sworn. He has been confined to his room (having gone by easy accommodations on a sleeping car to his home in Cokesbury, S. C.), and during that whole period of time he has discharged all the duties pertaining to his office of Representative fully, punctually, and efficiently by means of correspondence and an amanuensis, excepting the matter of personal appearance upon this floor.

The Constitution, Mr. Speaker, provides that the constitutional oath shall be taken by members of this House. There is a statute upon that subject, but the statute simply provides for the cases of personal appearance; and there is no statutory provision, for an instance of this sort. I submit, therefore, in view of the fact that Mr. AIKEN has discharged the duties usually pertaining to his office fully and efficiently, and has been prevented by personal affliction from making his appearance here, that the House, in the exercise of that power which it has under the Constitution, should accept this oath, sworn to and subscribed in due form, and waive his personal appearance in this instance under the circumstances.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I fully sympathize with the object which the gentleman has in view, but I am not certain that this is the regular mode of proceeding in a case of this kind. In the case of the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. Haskell, who was similarly situated and unable to be present, the question arose, and my impression is that the House decided what is now proposed could not be done.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I think that in the case of Mr. Haskell the Speaker was authorized to administer the oath to him in this city, which he did.

Mr. DIBBLE. I am glad the gentleman has recalled that instance. In the case of Mr. Haskell, as suggested by my friend from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], the Speaker was authorized to administer the oath. At least that is my impression, and I would inquire of the Chair whether such was not the fact?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. DIBBLE. That, therefore, is a precedent showing that the House can waive the personal appearance of a member. In this Mr. AIKEN is some 600 miles distant, but, the precedent having been already established that the personal presence of a member can be waived, I submit that the oath which I have sent to the Chair, which is duly taken and certified, ought to be accepted in this case.

The SPEAKER. Before the question is put, the oath had better be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, county of Abbeville.

In probate court.

I, D. WYATT AIKEN, do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter: so help me God.

D. WYATT AIKEN.

Sworn and subscribed before me this December 3, A. D. 1886.

J. FULLER LYON,
Judge, Probate Court.

[Seal of the court.]

Mr. DIBBLE. That paper is certified under the great seal of the State of South Carolina, authenticating its genuineness, and the authority of the officer to administer oaths.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter, and what is done in this case will undoubtedly establish a precedent to be followed in other cases. I would ask the gentleman from South Carolina, therefore, whether he has any objection to the question being referred to the Committee on the Judiciary? Let it be referred to that committee, and let them report immediately.

Mr. DIBBLE. Or to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, of course I have no objection to any disposition that the House may make of this matter, but if it is to be referred to a committee at all it seems to me that it would be more appropriately referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BURROWS. Very well; let it be referred to some committee.

Mr. DIBBLE. I suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BURROWS. That will be entirely satisfactory to me. I have no disposition to delay the matter at all; but it raises a very important question, which ought to be well considered.

Mr. DIBBLE. I appreciate fully the motives of the gentleman from Michigan, and I am content that the matter shall be referred to a committee; but I think it had better go to the Committee on Rules or to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. REED. It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that the matter ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and, by common consent, they might have the right to report at any time.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That is right.

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged matter, and if it is referred to a committee the privilege will continue when it is reported back.

Mr. REED. Then, I submit it ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is a question of law.

Mr. MORRISON. Why not to the Committee on Elections?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Elections, under the rules of the House, has jurisdiction only over contested-election cases.

Mr. DIBBLE. Then I move, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution and the accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the regular order of business is the call of the States and Territories for the introduction and reference of bills and resolutions. Under this call, resolutions and memorials of State and Territorial Legislatures are in order; also resolutions of inquiry addressed to heads of Departments.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House it would seem to go to the Committee on Claims. The jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations extends only to the appropriation of money for the support of the Government. This seems to be a claim against the Government.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina, also introduced a bill (H. R. 10553) to extend the time for filing claims in the Court of Claims under the operations of an act entitled "An act to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to July 31, 1801;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That should go to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds sometimes has had jurisdiction of bills of this character, and sometimes the Committee on Appropriations—in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I prefer it should go to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. As the sundry civil appropriation bill, in which these claims are included, has been reported, perhaps the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds would be the proper committee.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

DESTITUTE UNION SOLDIERS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

BUSINESS OF JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Rules, to which was referred the resolution I send to the Clerk's desk, to report the same back with the recommendation that a substitute I now present be adopted.

The resolution and substitute assign or fix a time for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report of the Committee on Rules. He will first report the original resolution referred to the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 7, 1887.

Resolved, That the 14th day of December, 1886, be set apart, immediately after the reading of the Journal, for the consideration of the bill (S. 19) and the amendment thereto, reported by the Judiciary Committee of the House, entitled "An act to amend an act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882, and from day to day thereafter, after the reading of the Journal, until their consideration is completed, subject to the consideration of revenue and general appropriation bills.

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred a resolution offered in the House December 7, 1886, setting apart Tuesday, the 14th day of December, for the consideration of Senate bill No. 10, has had the same under consideration, and reports back the accompanying resolution as a substitute therefor. The committee is of the opinion that some of the measures reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and now on the Calendar of the House, are of sufficient importance to justify the House in setting apart a day for their consideration, and therefore recommend the adoption of the substitute, as follows:

Resolved, That next Wednesday, January 12, immediately after reading the Journal, be, and is hereby, set apart for the consideration of bills and joint resolutions presented by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORRISON. It will be observed that the original resolution as referred to the Committee on Rules assigned a day for the consideration of certain bills reported from the Judiciary Committee, and such consideration to be continued from day to day until disposed of. The committee has reported a substitute assigning to the Judiciary Committee one day. The Utah or non-polygamy bill and others reported by that committee are believed to be of sufficient importance to justify this special assignment and provision for consideration. When the report is adopted and the time given, the question of consideration may still be raised on any bill the Judiciary Committee may call up, and it will still be in the power of the House by a majority to refuse consideration to any bill so to be called up, and I trust the report may now be adopted.

Mr. REED. For my part I should be perfectly willing that the privilege should be continued from day to day.

Mr. TUCKER. I wish to understand from the gentleman who reports the resolution, whether the order assigning Wednesday for business of the Judiciary Committee is subject to any prior order.

The SPEAKER. This resolution sets apart that day. Of course, it is always in the power of the House to refuse, by a majority vote, to consider any particular measure when called up. But this gives the Committee on the Judiciary the right to present its business.

Mr. MILLS. Does the privilege proposed to be granted to the committee interfere with appropriation bills?

The SPEAKER. The resolution sets apart that day for the business of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. REED. I desire to suggest to my colleague on the Committee on Rules whether the resolution should not provide for the business of the committee being considered from day to day until finished. I assented to the resolution but had the impression—through my own fault undoubtedly, not having examined carefully the text—that it was to continue from day to day until the business is finished.

Mr. TUCKER. I am very glad to hear the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine, and I would like very much to have the resolution so modified as to continue the privilege at least one day longer, giving us Thursday as well as Wednesday. I would like to propose that amendment.

Mr. MORRISON. I have no objection to any arrangement that will secure at least one day to the committee.

Mr. REED. If only one day is granted it may be filibustered away.

Mr. TUCKER. I will say with the leave of the House there are a large number of bills reported by the Judiciary Committee which are very important to be considered. Of course it is known to the House that the bill in reference to polygamy in Utah, which is a substitute proposed by the Judiciary Committee for the bill passed by the Senate, is one of prime importance; and it was considered by the committee in submitting the original resolution which I was directed to report as one of such importance that a day should be set apart for its consideration. I am afraid if only one day is set apart there may be shut out a great deal of other business which is important to be considered by the House as reported by the committee. I will therefore move an amendment to have the effect of giving us two days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves to amend the substitute resolution so that if the business of the committee shall not be completed on Wednesday it may be continued on Thursday.

Mr. REED. And it is understood the Mormon bill is to come up first?

Mr. TUCKER. I can not say that is understood, because there has been a change of the resolution originally submitted. There will be a meeting of the committee to-morrow.

Mr. REED. I sincerely hope this subject will not be played with in any way.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman from Maine has no right to say there is any purpose of playing with the subject.

Mr. REED. Neither have I any right nor have I any intention to say so.

Mr. TUCKER. I am glad to hear the gentleman's disclaimer.

Mr. REED. I simply wanted to call the attention of the House to the importance of this particular measure.

Mr. TUCKER. I say now, what I think my friend from Maine [Mr. REED] will bear me out in saying, that I have made every effort to reach that bill.

Mr. MORRISON. That goes without saying. Let us have something done with this resolution.

Mr. HATCH. Let us have the resolution read as amended.

Mr. TUCKER. I call for the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. MORRISON. The gentleman has not the floor to do that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That next Wednesday, January 12, immediately after reading the Journal, be and is hereby set apart for the consideration of bills and resolutions presented by the Committee on the Judiciary, and if not completed on that day, then that Thursday, January 13, be also set apart for the same purpose.

Mr. MORRISON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the amendment and on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment proposed by Mr. TUCKER was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the original resolution will be laid on the table, and the question now is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the committee, as amended.

The substitute as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DELAWARE INDIAN TRUST FUNDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 22d instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a draft of proposed legislation, prepared in the Office of Indian Affairs, providing for the per capita payment to the Delaware Indians resident in the Cherokee Nation, in the Indian Territory, of the amount of their trust fund, principal and interest, held by the Government of the United States by virtue of the several treaties with the said Delaware Indians.

The matter is presented for the consideration and action of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 10, 1887.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The remainder of this day is set apart for business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

SCHOOL BOARD FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 9125) which is the bill to create a school board for the District of Columbia, and prescribe its powers and duties; and upon that bill, which is now upon its passage, I ask for the previous question.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, is it proper at this stage to raise the question of consideration upon that bill?

The SPEAKER. It is. The previous question has not yet been ordered upon the passage of the bill, and in such a case it is always in the power of the House to determine whether to proceed with the consideration or not.

Mr. HOPKINS. I understand that there are several bills on the Calendar of great importance to the people of the District and to the public generally. This bill is one which members of the Committee on the District of Columbia admit is imperfect. I think it ought to be recommitted, and if it is presented to the House at all it should be in a corrected and improved form. I therefore raise the question of consideration, with the hope that the bill will go over, in order that the day may be devoted to general legislation for the advantage of the people of the District.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] raises the question of consideration against this bill, and the question is: Will the House now proceed to consider the bill?

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 85, noes 61.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it; and the House determines to proceed with the consideration of the bill. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] demands the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to recommit this bill with instructions to the committee to report it back with an amendment to fix the number of school directors at nine instead of twenty-four, as the bill now proposes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is this motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not, the previous question having been ordered on the passage of the bill. The motion is open to amendment, but not to debate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is it in order to ask whether nine is the number now prescribed by law?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is; and that is a sufficient number.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SPRINGER, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 43, noes 85.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON CABLE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BARBOUR. By direction of the committee, I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD], who will submit a motion in regard to what is known as the "traction railway bill."

Mr. HEARD. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8976) to incorporate the Washington Cable Railway Company, of the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8976).

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the opposition which has been manifested to this measure when heretofore under consideration, and in view of the desire of the District Committee to bring before the House a number of other measures which in their judgment will not, probably, provoke as much discussion as will this bill, I now move, in accordance with an agreement in the District Committee, that the Committee of the Whole rise and report this bill back to the House with the recommendation that its further consideration be postponed until Thursday, the 27th of January next.

In making this motion I will state that its object is to give the House a fair opportunity to decide whether it will further consider the bill. If such is the pleasure of the House, then let the motion prevail, and the day suggested be fixed. If it be the pleasure of the House that the bill shall not be further considered, that desire can be expressed in the vote upon this question. In the event that the expression of the House should be adverse to the consideration of the bill, the committee will take such steps as may be necessary to prevent this bill from further obstructing the consideration of other measures.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] why the consideration of this bill should be postponed. I have no knowledge of any measure now pending which is more important for the interests of this District than to get this railroad.

Mr. HEARD. I will say to the gentleman that it is not the desire of the majority of the committee to put off the consideration of this bill further than may be necessary in justice to other measures, which have received the favorable consideration of the committee. If it is the wish of the Committee of the Whole that this bill be further considered now, the motion to rise can be negatived, which would require that that bill be now proceeded with. However, for the reasons I have stated, and in fairness to other pending measures, the committee thought it best that this motion be submitted, so that a future day may be fixed for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to ask the gentleman another question.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] proceeds, the Chair will state that the only motion in order is a motion to rise. The Committee of the Whole can not designate what action the House shall take.

Mr. HEARD. Is it not competent for the Committee of the Whole to rise and report the bill back to the House with a recommendation?

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done.

Mr. HEARD. That is the motion I have made; that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that its further consideration be postponed until Thursday, the 27th of January next.

Mr. NELSON. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether the friends of the bill are in favor of this postponement.

Mr. HEARD. They are, most emphatically. I stand with the majority of the committee in favor of this bill; and I make this motion in accordance with the sentiment of the committee, in order, as I have stated, to give the House an opportunity to express its pleasure as to the further consideration of this bill, and to enable other measures recommended by the committee to come before the House.

Mr. BURROWS. Why not go on with the consideration of this bill now?

Mr. HEARD. If the House should so decide, it will please me, I assure you; but, in the judgment of the committee, it is but just to other pending measures that this motion should be made.

Mr. NEGLEY. I think there are no other District measures of more importance than this.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I see no reason why a bill of this important character should be postponed.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HEARD that the committee rise, and report the bill back to the House with a recommendation that its further consideration be postponed until Thursday, the 27th of January next, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 93, noes 6.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8976) had instructed him to report back the same with a recommendation that its further consideration be postponed until Thursday, January 27, 1887.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the report of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DINGLEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If this recommendation should be adopted, would this bill, on the day named, come up prior to the morning hour for the consideration of bills?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it would not come up until the rules of the House setting apart any portion of that day for the transaction of other business had been complied with.

Mr. HEARD. I call for the previous question on agreeing to the report of the Committee of the Whole.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one its clerks, announced disagreement to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes, and requested a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. DAWES, Mr. JONES of Arkansas, and Mr. BOWEN as managers of said conference on its part.

It further announced the return, in compliance with the request of the House, of duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 938) for the relief of Chittenden Brothers.

It further announced the passage of the bill (H. R. 7988) granting an increase of pension to Bryant Waters.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE EASTERN BRANCH.

Mr. BARBOUR. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering a bill (H. R. 4806) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River at the foot of Pennsylvania avenue east.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. RICHARDSON in the chair.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River, at the foot of Pennsylvania avenue, in the District of Columbia, a substantial wooden, iron, or masonry bridge, with necessary approaches; and the sum of —— dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction of said bridge and approaches, the same to be maintained as a free bridge for travel: Provided, That the said Secretary of War shall construct a bridge upon such plan as shall cost no more than the amount herein appropriated: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid out of the Treasury until contracts shall have been entered into with responsible parties, with good and sufficient securities, to be approved by the Secretary of War, for the construction and completion of said bridge, including the approaches, at a cost not to exceed —— dollars: And provided also, That the sum which may be expended under this act shall be treated and regarded as part of the general expenses of the District of Columbia, and the United States shall be credited with the amount which it may pay under this act for the erection of said bridge upon its fifty per centum of the expenses of the District of Columbia, as provided in the act of June 11, 1878, entitled, "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia:" Provided further, That the Secretary of War shall, as soon as possible, cause a survey of the river to be made to determine the length, width, and height of said bridge, and thereupon advertise for plans and prices for the construction of said bridge, such advertisement to be inserted in one or more daily newspapers published in Washington, D. C.; New York; Cleveland, Ohio; Detroit, Mich.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; and Richmond, Va.; for the space of one week: And provided further, That the sum of $5,000 shall be available at once for such investigation and surveys and such contingencies as the Secretary of War shall deem necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the amendment reported by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 8 and 20 fill the blanks by the insertion of $110,000 as the amount to be appropriated.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for the construction of a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac at the eastern end of Pennsylvania avenue, where it forms a junction with Kentucky avenue. In the early days there was a bridge at this point, one of the first bridges which led into Washington. It was burned in 1814 and has never been reconstructed.

The District of Columbia extends across the Eastern Branch and takes in the bluffs on the other side of the river. There is a connection by the navy-yard bridge to Anacostia, and some miles up the river there is another bridge. This one, however, leads directly out of the city at the end of Pennsylvania avenue. It saves several miles on the other side in reaching the present navy-yard bridge, and also makes a better passageway.

It is a bridge greatly needed, and has been for years, and it is one of those things which should be done, especially for the eastern part of the city of Washington.

The people, without expense to the District, caused a survey to be made of the bottom of the river, and piles to be driven and tests made, in order to find out the practicability of building a bridge and the cost thereof. The engineer of the District, detailed for that purpose, has made an estimate, and it has been determined under that estimate of $110,000, covering contingencies, a substantial bridge can be built. And I know of no improvement around Washington more earnestly demanded, or which will bring more benefit for the amount invested.

I do not care to go further into the question unless some gentleman desires to ask me a question.

Mr. PLUMB. What kind of a bridge is to be constructed under this bill?

Mr. ROWELL. Frame and on piles. It is impossible to build stone piers. This is the bridge recommended by the President in his annual message. It is of enough importance to have induced him to call special attention of Congress to it.

The committee's amendment filling the blanks was then agreed to.

Mr. ROWELL. I move the committee now rise and report the bill and amendment to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCCREARY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RICHARDSON reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4806) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River at the foot of Pennsylvania avenue east, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment.

Mr. ROWELL demanded the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX SALES IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I move to take up for present consideration the bill (S. 634) relating to sales for taxes in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That hereafter sales of real estate, after advertisement as required by law, by the collector of taxes for the District of Columbia, for taxes or assessments that have been or may be levied by the commissioners of said District, or by other lawful authority, shall entitle the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, if the property be not redeemed within two years from the date of such sale, to a deed from the commissioners of the District, which deed shall vest in the grantee a good and valid title, and shall be presumptive evidence in all controversies in relation thereto that the property so conveyed was subject to the taxes for which the property was sold, that such taxes were not paid, and that the property was not redeemed before the execution of the deed, and that the manner of levy, notice, sale, and all the other prerequisites of law were complied with necessary and proper to make such deed and title valid.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Unless there be some one who wishes to ask a question in reference to the provisions of the bill, I move that it be put upon its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAXES, CORCORAN ART GALLERY.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I ask now to take up the bill (S. 1130) to exempt from taxation all property held by the trustees of the Corcoran Gallery of Art, and for other purposes, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. BARBOUR. I move that the House now go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering that bill and others which are also in the committee.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Can we not consider this bill in the House?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BARBOUR. Then I make that request.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. What is the bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill had better be read for the information of the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all property held as endowment fund by the trustees of the Corcoran Gallery of Art, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, for the purpose of revenue to support said institution, shall be, and the same is hereby, declared exempt from all taxation and assessments by the municipal authorities or by the United States so long as the same shall be so held; and all taxes and assessments made or imposed upon any of the property of said trustees subsequent to the 10th day of May, 1869, whether real, personal, or mixed, be, and the same are hereby, released: Provided, That real estate heretofore purchased by said trustees in the management of the endowment fund shall be exempt from taxation only while so held, and not to exceed five years from the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I object.

Mr. BARBOUR. Then I make the motion that I originally submitted, which also embraces other business than this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that when the House is in Committee bills can be laid aside to be reported to the House, and other bills taken up as long as the gentleman sees proper to pursue that course.

The motion of Mr. BARBOUR was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DUNN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill (S. 1130) which has just been read.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report accompanying the bill be read.

The report (by Mr. BARBOUR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1130) to exempt from taxation all property held by the trustees of the Corcoran Gallery of Art, and for other purposes, have considered the same, and observing that the Senate committee has fully investigated the matter, adopt the Senate report as their own:

On the 10th day of April, 1869, W. W. Corcoran conveyed by deed to James M. Carlisle, James C. Hall, and others, trustees, and their successors, lots numbered 5, 6, 7, and 8, in square No. 167, in the city of Washington and District of Columbia, the object and purpose being—

"To establish an institution in Washington city, to be dedicated to art, and used solely for the purpose of encouraging American genius, in the production and preservation of works pertaining to the fine arts and kindred objects."

By the act approved May 24, 1870, said trustees were incorporated, and the fourth section provides as follows:

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the aforesaid buildings and grounds connected therewith, together with all the works of art that may be contained therein, shall be free from all taxes and assessments by the municipal authorities, or by the United States, so long as the same shall be held and used for the purpose hereinbefore set forth."

In addition to the buildings and grounds of the gallery and the works of art contained therein, estimated at about $700,000, there is an endowment fund of $1,011,000 held by the trustees, provided by Mr. Corcoran for the maintenance of the institution.

In a letter to the committee Mr. Corcoran says:

"A considerable portion of this endowment fund was invested by loan on seven houses, when the property was adjudged to be worth double the amount invested—all of which had to be bought in under the trusts.

"Of these, the trustees still hold five, the others having been sold at an aggregate loss on them of nearly $14,000. * * * They were bought in as a necessity to save further sacrifice of the funds loaned on them. It is the desire and purpose of the trustees to sell them as soon as practicable, and probably at a still further loss."

The tax collector has presented to the trustees the following bill for taxes for the year ending June 30, 1885:

[Personal tax.—Washington City. 73.]

Corcoran Art Gallery, Pennsylvania avenue, corner Seventeenth, to the District of Columbia, Dr.

For personal tax for year ending June 30, 1885, tax $1.50 per $100 assessed valuation:

To all of tax on $200,000, assessed value (mortgages, wharves, &c., in Boston, &c.)	$3,000
To penalty of 8 per cent	240
	3,240

Received payment, ——— ———, Collector.

By ——— ———.

(On the margin:) Last notice prior to distraint. By order of Commissioners D. C.

The committee is of opinion that the property held for the support of a public charity such as this should be exempt from taxation, the endowment fund as well as the buildings, grounds, and works of art.

And while the committee does not think it good policy to allow corporations of this character to invest in real estate, except so far as necessary for their own immediate purposes, yet, inasmuch as the trustees of this charity were compelled to purchase certain houses to save the endowment fund from serious loss, the committee recommends that such of said houses and lots as are still held by said trustees shall be exempt from taxation while so held, provided they shall not be so held for more than five years from the passage of this bill.

Your committee therefore report the bill back to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Let me ask the gentleman what is the aggregate value of the property belonging to this institution?

Mr. BARBOUR. The report shows. I know but little more than is embodied in the report. It will be seen that the report states:

In addition to the buildings and grounds of the Gallery and the works of art contained therein, estimated at about $700,000, there is an endowment fund of $1,011,000 held by the trustees, &c.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. And the value of the house itself?

Mr. BARBOUR. This embraces all of their property, as I understand it.

The endowment fund, I will state to the gentleman, was loaned upon mortgages. The payment in some instances was not made of the interest, and the land was finally sold at a loss, as stated in the report. Now, the trustees ask that the other houses, where the same condition of affairs exists, and which are also covered by the mortgages, may be exempt from taxation while in the transition state of being realized upon as a part of the endowment fund. This is a great public institution, and most munificently endowed by Mr. Corcoran for the benefit of the city and of the whole country, and I think it would be really a hard case to impose taxes upon such an object as this.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, there is perhaps no one in this District who has been more munificent than Mr. Corcoran to the various charitable institutions of the city, and I would be the last one to detract in the least from the credit due to him, or by any suggestion or action of mine permit such a thing to be done. On the contrary, I should certainly desire to see accorded to him the full merit that is his due. In opposing this bill, therefore, I wish it to be clearly understood that there is no gentleman on this floor who more highly appreciates the generosity and public spirit of Mr. Corcoran, and the noble example he has set each year in maintaining these institutions and devoting a part of his fortune to the benefit of the public. But it so happens in this case that there is a wholly different question presented than the munificence of Mr. Corcoran or the praise given to that which he has already done. That question is whether the property held by the Corcoran Art Gallery should be freed from its due share of public taxation. Mr. Corcoran, what he has done, and the glory which will always attach to his name, are on that side of the question. On the other is the bare abstract question: Whether property of this character should be free from its share of public burdens while receiving all the protection of the law? It is that question I shall discuss, and not in the least the other.

You take any one poor laboring man here, the servant in the dining-room, if you please, or the cook in the kitchen, who happens to be able to get a lot with fifty or a hundred dollars and a little house. He must pay his share of public taxes as imposed by this municipality, and we all recognize that as right. Any one who happens to have property here, just as in any other city of the Union, must expect to have it taxed in proportion to its value, and that is only right. Now I fail to see why this art gallery, a most noble institution, and yet one which is for the collection of works of art alone, should be exempt. It is not to furnish bread and butter to anybody. It is not to employ anybody in particular. It is not creating wealth. It is simply and barely a collection of works of art which people coming to Washington may have the opportunity of inspecting. While we are all glad to see it, and I wish this endowment might be larger and the works of art more numerous and the best and most valuable in the world, but even admitting all of that, why should not they pay their just share of taxes? It seems to me that the line should be drawn somewhere.

So far as I am individually concerned, I am opposed to releasing even church property from taxation. I think it should all bear its proportion, and I think this gallery ought also to pay its share. That is the whole question. It happens now, in investing the endowment fund, that they have come into possession of two, or ten, or say, even, a thousand houses; it does not matter; the principle is the same. They have taken these houses to satisfy mortgages. They have bought some, and now they ask that the taxes be released. In 1869 or '79—some years since, at any rate—taxes were assessed upon the property, and now it is asked that they be released.

Mr. BARBOUR. Not in this bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I thought it was.

Mr. BARBOUR. No, sir; the only proposition is to exempt taxes in the words of the report, as follows:

For personal tax for year ending June 30, 1885, tax $1.50 per $100 assessed valuation:

To all of tax on $200,000, assessed value (mortgages, wharves, &c., in Boston, &c.)	$3,000
To penalty of 8 per cent	240
	3,240

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Were there not some prior taxes?

Mr. BARBOUR. Oh, no.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That, however, is immaterial to the point I am now making.

Mr. FELTON. Have they property which they do not use for the purposes of the art gallery?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. They may take their endowment fund and buy houses with it; and the precedent sought to be established is that where they so invest their endowment fund that property is released from taxation, because it is now asked in this bill that three houses which have been so bought shall be released from tax.

As I said, I have no desire to do anything more than to express my opinion on this proposition. I stand behind no man in awarding luminous praise to Mr. Corcoran, and I stand behind no man in appreciating the art gallery. And yet I stand behind no man in feeling that the property of this town should equally bear its share of public burden. That is my proposition, and for that reason I shall oppose the bill.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The question involved in this bill is a very simple one. As everybody knows, the art gallery which exists in this city is not established for the mere purpose of collecting a number of pictures which people may enjoy by looking at them. If my friend from Kansas had read the report of the committee he would have found the object of the gallery is thus stated:

To establish an institution in Washington city to be dedicated to art and used solely for the purpose of encouraging American genius in the production and preservation of works pertaining to the fine arts and kindred objects.

The object of the gallery is seen from this portion of the deed by which it was endowed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from South Carolina allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Who decides what pictures shall go into this gallery?

Mr. HEMPHILL. That is decided by the trustees who have charge of the institution.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Who appoints the trustees?

Mr. HEMPHILL. They were appointed by Mr. Corcoran, originally, as I understand.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman from South Carolina, who seems to be familiar with this matter, give us any information how it happens—whether it is a mere accident—that in the collection of the pictures of distinguished citizens, living and dead, of the United States in the Corcoran Gallery there is a significant absence of the pictures of the men who fought upon the side of the Union during the recent war, while there is a conspicuous presence of the distinguished gentlemen who fought upon the other side? Is that accidental, or has it been produced by the will of somebody; and if so, can the gentleman tell us whose will it is?

Mr. HEMPHILL. All I can say, is that that is a matter I know nothing about. I do not know that there is any particular conspicuousness in the art gallery of those who fought for the Government or of those who fought on the other side.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is there not a total absence in that gallery of those who fought on the Union side?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And not only that; but have not the pictures of those distinguished soldiers been removed from that gallery and their places supplied by distinguished gentlemen who fought on the other side?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Does the gentleman from Ohio know what he is now stating to be the fact?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand that to be the fact; and I know it to be a fact that the gallery contains no pictures of soldiers of the Union Army, unless in their capacity as Presidents, while Lee and Stonewall Jackson occupy conspicuous places in it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not think we can enter upon that question. The question is whether this art gallery, which is established for a perfectly legitimate and worthy purpose, shall receive this much encouragement at the hands of the Government.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The question of its purpose is the one I have raised; I mean the spirit of its organization.

Mr. BARBOUR. I want to say one word to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. This is a bill which comes from the Senate, and I presume that body, in which there is a majority of the friends of the gentleman from Ohio, would have looked at this question with regard to the distinguished Union generals whose portraits are not in the art gallery. I have not been in the gallery and know little about it, although a good deal about Washington. I have not had the time and leisure to go there; and I never heard made elsewhere the allegations now made here by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I heard them made by a member of Congress in a speech he delivered in a society in this city.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If that is the gentleman's only authority I think it is a very poor one.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have the testimony of my own eyes, and I have asked the gentleman from South Carolina the question as to his knowledge of a fact which I affirm to be true of my own authority.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I desire to know if there is any general rule of law in this District exempting certain institutions from taxation.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know that there is any general rule of law; but it is the universal practice here to exempt churches and charitable institutions from payment of taxes. And this building, I will say further, the Corcoran Art Gallery, together with its endowments, has always been exempt from taxation; and the only question with reference to this bill is whether or not certain houses which it became necessary to purchase, to save a portion of the endowment fund, shall be exempted from taxation for a period not exceeding five years, so that the trustees of the institution may have an opportunity to dispose of them within the time they are exempted from taxation.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Then the effect of the bill is only upon that property which the institution has heretofore bought for taxes.

Mr. HEMPHILL. A portion of the fund was invested in seven buildings, five of which have had to be bought in by the trustees at a loss of $14,000. This tax, as I understand, has accrued upon the buildings which they still hold. This bill provides that the property shall be exempt from taxes for a period not exceeding five years, with the expectation, of course, that they will either sell the houses within that time or will pay the taxes on them, if they do not sell them.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Can the gentleman inform me whether the exemption which charitable institutions enjoy in this District is confined to that portion of their property which is actually used for charitable purposes, or does it extend to other property?

Mr. HEMPHILL. This is a portion of the endowment fund which is used for the purpose of keeping up the institution.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Not directly. The property used directly for that purpose is the property used for the gallery, the building, and grounds. The property used to raise a fund to support the institution is not directly used for the gallery and grounds. In my own State, and I think in other States, there is a distinction made between property used by a charitable institution for the direct purposes of the trust and other property held for purposes of profit, even though the profit goes into the treasury of the institution. I would like to know whether there is any such general rule of law in this District?

Mr. HEMPHILL. There is a law which provides that churches and school-houses and charitable institutions generally shall be exempt from taxation. A great many exemption bills are passed from time to time, but as to what particular property is covered by such exemptions, of course I can not answer that in any general way, because it depends upon the terms of each particular act.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Suppose a church owns a block of buildings, does that property come under the exemption?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know whether it does or not.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Then this bill is intended to make an exception in favor of this institution as compared with other charitable institutions.

Mr. HEMPHILL. This bill is not designed to make an exception in this case, because the act which incorporated the Corcoran Art Gallery exempted all its property, that on which the building is situated, the pictures, and the endowment.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. All the property held by the institution?

Mr. HEMPHILL. The whole of the property held by the institution.

Mr. CUTCHEON. At that time?

Mr. HEMPHILL. At that time.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But this property, to which this bill applies, was subsequently acquired, was it not?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Can the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] inform us whether the property to which this bill applies is rented at the present time?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I don't know whether it is or not. They have sustained a loss of $14,000 from this property, and they will sustain another loss, when they sell the remainder.

Mr. BARBOUR. As I understand it, if you tax this property, you thereby subtract from the fund for the maintenance of this noble charity and diminish the capacity of the trustees to purchase additional paintings and other works of art for the benefit of the public.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. As I listened to the reading I thought this was a broad bill, covering all property which this institution might hereafter hold.

Mr. BARBOUR. No, sir.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Now I understand that it relates only to certain property heretofore bought for taxes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That is all right.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask the gentleman to withhold that motion until I make a remark.

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield for the gentleman's remark.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] a few moments ago spoke of a speech delivered by a member of Congress, and referred to it as his authority for a statement which he made here, and I understood the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] to remark that that was rather poor authority. As the speech to which I presume the gentleman from Ohio referred was somewhat widely published at the time, and as I made the speech [laughter], I desire to accept all the responsibility that may attach to it, and to state here now the whole sum and substance of my offending.

At a meeting in this city of an association of the officers of the Union Army and Navy engaged in the late war, among other things which I said, I did call attention to what seemed to me to be the very remarkable fact that here at the national capital, in the great national gallery which the bulk of our people look upon as supported, or at least encouraged, by the Government, there should be found at this late day, or at the time when the speech was made, no portraiture, so far as I could ascertain, of any one of the great military or naval chieftains who fought upon the side of the Union, while there are conspicuously exhibited in one of the corridors, where it is impossible to avoid seeing them, two magnificent portraits, of heroic size, of two of the principal chieftains upon the other side, representing them in the full panoply of their military character, one of them having his hands resting upon a map of the topography of the vicinity of Washington, being depicted as planning an assault upon the capital of the nation, and each of them being represented in his full military accouterments.

I made that statement. I simply expressed my surprise that such should be the fact. I made no charge. I had no knowledge as to the control of that institution. Subsequently, in order to make sure that I had made no mistake, I revisited the gallery, and there carefully reexamined all the different rooms; and while I may have overlooked something, I was unable, with the strictest scrutiny, to find the portrait of any one of the great military or naval chieftains who served on the Union side in the late war. I did find the picture of General Grant—no, of President Grant—as well as portraits of President Hayes and President Garfield, in the continuous series of portraits of Presidents of the United States.

Now, I desire to accept the full responsibility for having called the attention of some of my comrades in the Union service to what seemed to me to be a very remarkable fact. As to who is responsible for it, or what may have been the animus that brought about this condition of things, I do not pretend to speak of or to know.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, it really seems to me hardly worth while for us to go off on this side issue. I know nothing about the paintings in this gallery, for, as I have said, I have never been there; but here we are dealing with a charity, and there is, I believe, an old rule that we should not "look a gift horse in the mouth." If we accept this local charity from Mr. Corcoran, we have not the right, it seems to me, to tell him what pictures he ought to put in his gallery. He has delegated that authority to the board of directors, gentlemen of very high character, and many of them of national reputation. So far as regards the matter which has been brought up here, I think this House can very well afford to let it pass. I move that this bill be laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

The motion was agreed to, there being—ayes 71, noes 12.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

Mr. BARBOUR. I call up for consideration the bill (S. 1188) to exempt the property of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington, D. C., from taxation.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the property known as lot 3, square 222, being house numbered 1409 New York avenue, in Washington city, District of Columbia, occupied by the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington, be, and the same is hereby, exempt from all taxation so long as the same is so occupied and used; and the taxes which have accrued and become due on and after July 1, 1884, be, and the same are hereby, released, subject to the provisions of section 8 of the act approved March 3, 1877, providing for exemptions of church and school property from taxation.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, the only purpose of this bill is to interpret the existing law in regard to the exemption of the property of the Young Men's Christian Association of this District from taxation. The property of the association, while not used for other purposes than those of the association, is now by law exempt; but the association has been in the habit of receiving rent for a small portion of its building, and therefore the commissioners have held that the property is taxable. The whole building, except this very small portion of it, is used for the benevolent purposes of this association; and the object of this bill is to overcome the existing difficulty so that the whole building shall be exempted. We propose simply to make an interpretation of the law for the guidance of the commissioners.

I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

FRANCIS DENMEAD.

Mr. BARBOUR. I call up the bill (S. 766) for the relief of Francis Denmead.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the United States of America hereby quit-claims and releases to Francis Denmead, his heirs and assigns, any title or interest which the United States have, by reason of any escheat or supposed escheat, in and to the following-described real estate situate, being, and lying in the city of Washington and District of Columbia, known and designated on the public plat or plan of said city as lots numbered 1, 2, 18, 19, and 20, in square numbered 924.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is simply that the United States may give a quit-claim title to a certain piece of property which is supposed to have escheated to the District of Columbia on account of the failure of the legitimate heirs of a former owner. Mr. Denmead, who at present has possession of the property, is, in fact, the real owner, having paid taxes on it for a number of years, and being clearly and honestly entitled to the property. If no gentleman desires to make any inquiry I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

TAX ON REAL-ESTATE AGENTS.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I call up for consideration the bill (S. 1882) to repeal parts of an act relating to tax on the business of real-estate agents in the District of Columbia, approved June 20, 1872.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill is on the House Calendar and can not be considered in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. This is a bill in relation to the tax on real estate agents in the District of Columbia, and it seems to me it is improperly on the House Calendar. It should have been referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. Still, though the bill may have been erroneously placed on the House Calendar, it can not be now considered, as it has never been referred by the House to the Committee of the Whole.

CORNELIA P. RANDOLPH AND OTHERS.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 8893) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to execute a deed of quit-claim and release to a certain alley in Washington to Cornelia P. Randolph and others.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia, be and they are hereby, authorized and directed to execute to Cornelia P. Randolph, Mary M. Turner, Harriet J. Pickett, and Elizabeth G. Culbert, a deed releasing and quit-claiming to said parties all right, title, and interest of the United States and of the District of Columbia in and to all that portion of the alley in square 105, in the city of Washington, as said alley is laid down in the plat or plan of said city, which was formerly the outlet from the main alley to I street north.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to strike out, in line 6, the words "Culbert" and insert "Calvert," was agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the bill, as amended, be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY ANNA EGAN.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 2037) for the relief of Mary Anna Egan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That upon payment of the principal of the amount of special-improvement taxes levied or assessed in the year 1875, and now outstanding upon the books of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, on account of or against parts of lots numbered 10 and 11, in square numbered 557, fronting on New Jersey avenue, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and charged either to Mary Anna Egan or James Egan, her late husband, all interest accumulated thereon, and penalties of every kind and nature whatsoever for the non-payment thereof, be, and the same are hereby, remitted and cancelled.

SEC. 2. That any payment heretofore made on account of accumulated interest on special-improvement taxes levied or assessed on any portion of the aforesaid lots in the year 1875, against Mary Anna Egan or her late husband, James Egan, shall be applied to the payment and satisfaction of the principal of said tax remaining unpaid.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, and Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois, asked for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2037) for the relief of Mary Anna Egan, subjoin the Senate report and recommend that the bill do pass.

The petitioner, Mary Anna Egan, is the widow of a soldier and officer of the United States Army, the late James Egan, who died in 1883. During his life he was the owner of several small lots of land in this city, fronting on New Jersey avenue, the same being part of lots 10 and 11 in square 557. This was all the property he had. That prior to his death he deeded the same to his wife, the petitioner; that for many years previous to his death, and up to the time of it, he had been stationed at Fort Robinson, on the frontier, in Nebraska; that his wife, the petitioner, accompanied him; that while the said James Egan was on the frontier in discharge of his duty as soldier, and his wife with him, a special improvement-assessment tax was made upon these lots of land; this assessment was made in the year 1875; that no notice was given him of the assessment, although his address was known to the officials making it; that he had no knowledge of it at the time he made the conveyance to his said wife, nor at the time of his death; that his wife, the petitioner, had no knowledge of the assessment till late in the year 1885, when she attempted to make sale of one of the lots; that the said James Egan had paid the ordinary tax upon the lots regularly up to the time of his death, and his wife afterward; that the rate of interest claimed is 10 per cent. on these special assessments; that the accumulation has been so great that the interest and the assessment amount to nearly the value of the land.

Your committee have great doubt whether the assessment of this special improvement tax is legal, but it is a cloud upon the title, and in consideration of the want of any notice to the owner, or any knowledge of the existence of the tax, they recommend that upon the payment of the amount of the original assessment, the interest and all fines and forfeitures be remitted and canceled, and they, therefore, report a bill to accomplish that purpose, and recommend that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BARBOUR. I move the committee rise and report the bills to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DUNN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration District of Columbia business, and had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

CORCORAN ART GALLERY.

The question first recurred upon ordering to be engrossed and read a third time the bill (H. R. 1130) to exempt from taxation the property held by the trustees of the Corcoran Gallery of Art, and for other purposes.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 11.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Before raising the point of no quorum I will ask the gentleman in charge of the bill to allow us to have a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. BARBOUR. I have no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. If you will allow that I will withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Unless by unanimous consent it will require one-fifth of the members present to order the yeas and nays.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not want the yeas and nays now.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. No; but on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of order of no quorum.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I do.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas.. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 12, not a sufficient number.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, and Mr. BARBOUR.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 136, noes 23.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The majority of the House would seem to be in favor of the bill, and therefore I withdraw my point of no quorum.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

The bill (S. 1188) to exempt the property of the Young Men's Christian Association, of Washington, D. C., from taxation, reported favorably, was taken up, ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRANCIS DENMEAD.

The bill (S. 766) for the relief of Francis Denmead, reported favorably, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY ANNA EAGAN.

The act (S. 2037) for the relief of Mary Anna Eagan, reported favorably, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORNELIA B. RANDOLPH AND OTHERS.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to the bill (H. R. 8893) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to execute a deed of quit-claim and release on a certain alley in Washington to Cornelia B. Randolph and others, was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FOREIGN EXECUTORS.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 7596) to enable foreign executors and administrators to sue in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to enable foreign executors and administrators to sue in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for any person or persons to whom letters testamentary or of administration have been or hereafter may be granted by the proper authority, in any of the United States or the Territories thereof, to maintain any suit or action and to prosecute and recover any claim in the District of Columbia, in the same manner as if the letters testamentary or of administration had been granted to such person or persons by the proper authority in said District; and the letters testamentary or of administration, or a copy thereof, certified under the seal of the authority granting the same, shall be sufficient evidence to prove the granting thereof, and that the person or persons, as the case may be, hath or have administration: Provided, nevertheless, That the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall have the power, and such power is hereby given to the said court, upon petition of any one interested, to require from such person or persons the security now required by law in like cases from a resident administrator or executor.

SEC. 2. That all exceptions in favor of parties beyond the District of Columbia which may by existing laws be replied or relied on in any action or proceeding brought in the said District are hereby repealed and abrogated: Provided, That this section shall not affect the right of parties in actions now pending.

The report (by Mr. HEMPHILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7596) to enable foreign executors and administrators to sue in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, respectfully report:

That they have asked the counsel of the Bar Assocation as to the propriety of the bill. They recommend its passage, saying, "These sections were originally contained in the statute of 1812, and it is supposed were inadvertently repealed by the adoption of the Revised Statutes."

The committee therefore report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGULATING INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. ROWELL. I now call up for consideration the bill (S. 1213) to regulate insurance in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That no company hereafter organized or incorporated within the District of Columbia shall transact the business of insurance in any of its branches unless the whole capital of such company be not less than $100,000, actually and in good faith paid up in full, in cash, excepting life-insurance companies which issue to their members policies or certificates agreeing to pay benefits or sums of money which are to be realized by assessments levied upon the members; no other capital than such assessments shall be required of them. The commissioners of said District, or any two of them, shall ascertain and determine such facts, upon evidence satisfactory to them, to be filed in their office, and thereupon shall issue to such companies authority to transact business.

SEC. 2. That every insurance company doing business in said District must transmit to the commissioners of the District a statement of its condition and business for the year ending on the preceding 31st day of December, which statement shall be rendered on the 1st day of January following or within sixty days thereafter, except that foreign companies shall transmit their statements of business, other than that done in the United States, prior to the following 1st day of July, which statements must be in form and state the particulars required by the blanks prescribed by the commissioners; and the commissioners, or any two of them, may require at any time statements from any company doing business within the District, or from any of its officers or agents, on such points as they may deem necessary and proper to elicit a full exhibit of its business and standing, all of which statements herein required must be verified by the signatures and oaths of the president or vice-president, or the secretary or actuary. No company having neglected to file a statement required of it within the time and manner prescribed shall do any business, after notification by the commissioners, or any two of them, while such neglect continues; and any company or association neglecting to make and transmit any statement required shall forfeit $100 for each day's neglect.

SEC. 3. That every fire insurance company, to entitle itself to the written authority by this act required to transact business in the District, shall have assets equal to its liabilities, including a reinsurance reserve liability equal to 50 per cent. of premiums received upon one-year risks, and an amount proportioned to the unexpired time upon all other fire risks. Every company doing an inland or marine business shall have assets equal to its liabilities, including a reinsurance reserve liability equal to the total premiums charged upon all unexpired inland or marine risks. Every life-insurance company, excepting those organized upon the plan of assessments on their members, shall have assets equal to its liabilities, including a reserve liability computed upon the basis of the American experience table of mortality, at 4½ per cent. interest. Before issuing any written authority to any company to transact business in the District, the commissioners, or a majority of them, shall satisfy themselves that such company has complied with the law; and at any time thereafter they shall revoke such authority when satisfied that such company has fallen below such requirements.

SEC. 4. That no insurance company organized or incorporated under the laws of any of the United States of America, or of any foreign state or country, shall transact the business of insurance in any of its branches within the District of Columbia until such company shall have duly constituted some proper person domiciled in the District their agent and attorney in fact for the purpose of receiving for them summonses, writs, and processes issuing out of any court having any jurisdiction in said District, and until the evidence of such appointment of such agent and attorney in fact, authenticated in a manner satisfactory to the commissioners of the District, or any two of them, shall be filed in the office of such commissioners.

SEC. 5. That any insurance company, or any officer or agent of any insurance company, effecting any contract of insurance in behalf of such company when the written authority required by this act shall not have been given by said commissioners, or after such authority has been revoked, shall be subject to a penalty of $100 for every offense, to be recovered by due process in the courts of the District.

SEC. 6. That each insurance company doing business in the District of Columbia shall attach to each policy issued by such company a copy of the application made by the insured, so that the whole contract may appear in said application and policy.

SEC. 7. That this act shall take effect and be in full force after ninety days rom its passage.

Mr. ROWELL. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. ROWELL) was read, as follows:

The bill is designed to protect insurers. Its provisions have been tested in the practice of several States, and have been found to be of great benefit.

Your committee recommend that the bill pass, with an amendment as follows:

In lines 4 and 5 of section 2, strike out the words "accompanied by a list of the names of the stockholders."

The amendment proposed by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. ROWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF PROPERTY FROM FIRE.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report back the following bill, being the bill (S. 1212) for the further protection of property from fire, and safety of lives in the District of Columbia, and ask its immediate consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the owner or owners, in fee or for life, of every building constructed and used, or intended to be used, as a hotel, factory, manufactory, theater, tenement house, seminary, college, academy, hospital, asylum, hall, or place of amusement, and of the trustee or trustees of every estate, association, society, college, academy, school, hospital, or asylum owning or using any building 50 feet high or upwards, to provide and cause to be erected and affixed to said building iron fire-escapes and combined standpipes and ladders, or either of said appliances as may be approved and adopted by the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That in all hotels, factories, manufactories, workshops, schools, seminaries, colleges, hospitals, asylums, halls, or places of amusement, or other places mentioned in this act, the hallways and stairways shall be properly lighted when occupied at night; and at the head and foot of each flight of stairs, and at the intersection of all hallways with main corridors, shall be kept during the night a red light; and one or more proper alarms or gongs, capable of being heard throughout the building, shall always remain easy of access and ready for use in each of said buildings, to give notice to the inmates in case of fire; and there shall be kept posted in a conspicuous place in every sleeping-room a notice descriptive of such means of escape; and the building inspector and chief engineer of the fire department shall have the right to designate the location of the said fire-escapes and stand-pipes in conformity with this act, and shall grant certificates of approval to every person, firm, corporation, trustee, and board of school trustees complying with the requirements of this act, which certificates shall relieve the party or parties from the liabilities of fines or damages imposed by this act.

SEC. 3. That every person, corporation, trustee, or board of school directors neglecting or refusing to comply with the requirements of the first section of this act, upon receiving thirty days' notice of the same, shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $100, to be collected as fines are now by law collected; and the building inspector and chief engineer shall cause to be erected upon said building said appliances as in their judgment may be necessary, and the same shall be charged and held as a lien against said property and collected the same as other improvements made by the District authorities; and in case of fire occurring in any such building not provided with said appliances as may be required by the building inspector and chief engineer of the fire department, and in accordance with the requirements of the first section of this act, the person, persons, trustee, trustees, corporation, or school directors who or which neglected to provide such building with said appliances as aforesaid shall be liable in an action for damages in case of death or personal injury being caused in consequence of such fire breaking out in said building; and such action may be maintained by any person or persons now authorized by law to sue as in other cases for injuries caused by neglect of duty.

SEC. 4. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The report (by Mr. HEARD) was read, as follows:

This committee having heretofore reported on the bill (H. R. 9034) which is substantially the same as the bill (S. 1212) adopt as its report on the said Senate bill the House report heretofore made as aforesaid, except that instead of recommending the amendment therein suggested to be made in line 8 of the printed bill, it is recommended that there be inserted after the word "upwards," in the seventh line of the Senate bill, the words "used for any of the purposes herein above mentioned;" and that when so amended the bill do pass.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. HEARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF STEAM ENGINEERING, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. COMPTON. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 4308) to regulate steam engineering in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be unlawful for any person to act as steam engineer in the District of Columbia who shall not have been regularly licensed to do so by the commissioners thereof.

SEC. 2. That all persons applying for such license shall be examined by a board of examiners composed as follows: The boiler inspector for the District of Columbia and two practical machinists to be appointed by the District commissioners.

SEC. 3. That applicants for license as steam engineers must be twenty-one years of age and of temperate habits; must make application in writing, to which application must be attached a certificate as to character and moral habits signed by at least three citizens of the District of Columbia, themselves of moral standing.

SEC. 4. That the fee for a license as steam engineer shall be $5.

SEC. 5. That any person employed as a licensed steam engineer in the District of Columbia who is found under the influence of intoxicating liquor while on duty shall, for the first offense, have his license revoked for six months; for the second offense, twelve months; and for the third offense, shall be forever debarred from following the occupation of licensed steam engineer in the District of Columbia.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

Add to line 5 of the first section the words:

"Said examination shall be conducted in all respects under such rules and regulations as the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall from time to time provide; and all steam-boiler engines shall be subjected to such tests as the said commissioners may prescribe."

Also, in the fifth section strike out the word "forever" and insert, after the word "shall," in line 6, the words "have his license revoked, and."

Also, after the words "District of Columbia," in line 8, add "for the period of five years."

Add, also, sections 6, 7, and 8, as follows:

SEC. 6. That any owner or lessee of a steam boiler or engine, or the secretary of any corporation, who shall knowingly employ a steam engineer as such who has not been regularly licensed to act as such, shall, on conviction thereof by the police court of the District of Columbia, be fined $50, and in default of payment of such fine shall be confined for a period of one month in the workhouse of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 7. That none other than steam engineers licensed by said commissioners, or under the laws of the States from which they come, shall be employed in the Executive Departments of the United States in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 8. That this act shall take effect sixty days after the approval thereof.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COMPTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX ON REAL-ESTATE AGENTS.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I now ask to call up the bill (S. 1882) to repeal parts of an act relating to tax on the business of real- estate agents in the District of Columbia, approved June 20, 1872, and put it upon its passage.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of clause 38 of section 21 of the act of the legislative assembly of the District of Columbia entitled "An act imposing a license on trades, business, and professions practiced or carried on in the District of Columbia," approved August 23, 1871, requiring real-estate agents to pay $25 annually, and in addition a monthly tax of one-fourth per centum on gross receipts, as amended by the act amendatory thereof, approved June 20, 1872, as requires real-estate agents in said District to pay a tax of 1 per centum on their commissions in lieu of said monthly tax of one-fourth per centum on gross receipts, and so much of section 15 of said act approved August 23, 1871, as requires said real-estate agents to give bond to said District, and all other laws and acts, or parts thereof, inconsistent herewith, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and from and after the passage of this act real-estate agents in the District of Columbia shall pay a license-fee of $50 per annum, to be collected as other licenses are collected in said District.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed—there being on a division—ayes 48, noes 7.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POLICE REGULATIONS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GROUT. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report back the bill (S. 2600) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make police regulations for the government of said District, and ask its consideration at this time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to make, modify, and enforce usual and reasonable police regulations in and for said District as follows:

First. For causing full inspection to be made, at any reasonable times, of the places where the business of pawnbroking, junk-dealing, or second-hand clothing business may be carried on.

Second. To regulate the storage of highly inflammable substances in the thickly populated portions of the District.

Third. To locate the places where licensed venders on the streets and public places shall stand, and change them as often as the public interests require, and to make all the necessary regulations governing their conduct upon the streets in relation to such business.

Fourth. To make needful regulations for the orderly disposition of carriages or other vehicles assembled on streets or public places, and to require vehicles upon the most frequented streets and avenues to pass along on the right side thereof.

Fifth. To establish and regulate the charges to be made by owners of hacks and hackney carriages of any kind whatsoever.

Sixth. To prohibit conducting droves of cattle upon such streets and avenues as they may deem needful to public safety and good order.

Seventh. To regulate the keeping and running at large of dogs and fowls.

Eighth. To prohibit the deposit upon the streets or sidewalks of fruit, or any part thereof, or other substance or articles that might litter the same, or cause injury to or impede pedestrians.

Ninth. To regulate or prohibit loud noises with horns, gongs, or other instruments, or loud cries, upon streets or public places, and to prohibit the use of any fireworks or explosives within such portions of the District as they may think necessary to public safety.

Tenth. To regulate the movements of vehicles on the public streets and avenues for the preservation of order and protection of life and limb.

Eleventh. To prescribe reasonable penalties for the violation of any of the regulations in this act mentioned; and said penalties may be enforced in any court in the District of Columbia having jurisdiction of minor offenses, and in the same manner that such minor offenses are now by law prosecuted and punished.

SEC. 2. That the regulations herein provided for shall, when adopted, be printed in one or more of the daily newspapers published in the District of Columbia; and no penalty prescribed for the violation of said regulations shall be enforced until thirty days after such publication.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to take this opportunity of inquiring of the Committee on the District of Columbia, or some gentleman, since it seems to be proposed to take the tax off of everythingelse that presents itself to-day, what has become of the bill for the relief of commercial travelers? It has been allowed all over the United States to have that tax repealed, and it is unworthy of the District that such atax is levied here, and is certainly quite as objectionable as the real-estate tax. I would like to know what has become of that bill.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, what has that to do with the bill now under consideration, I would inquire.

Mr. STEELE. I simply call the attention of the House to the fact in connection with these several bills for relieving property from taxation, and for regulating other classes of business in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that the bill he refers to is pending before the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEELE. It has been pending before the committee for a number of years.

Mr. BARBOUR. It was reported at the last session, passed this House, went to the Senate, and I think was lost there in the latter part of the session.

Mr. STEELE. Is there any probability of its being reported this session?

Mr. BARBOUR. I suppose the proposition will come up here on a bill which the Senate has passed relating to that subject.

Mr. STEELE. Then there is a prospect of that bill coming before the House.

Mr. BARBOUR. I hope so.

Mr. STEELE. That is an answer to my question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the pending bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GROUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BARBOUR. We seem to have made considerable progress to-day with business of the District of Columbia, and after the long sitting we have had I have concluded I would not detain the House by calling up any more bills to-day. I therefore move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the memorial of Rev. John H. Elliott and others, a committee of the general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, on the subject of collecting statistics of marriage and divorce, to report the same back, together with an amendment intended to be proposed to the legislative, &c., appropriation bill. I ask that both the memorial and the amendment be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10056) granting to the Saint Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company the right of way through the Indian reservations in Northern Montana and Northwestern Dakota, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred amendments intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill providing for appropriations for the erection of granite monuments or memorial tablets for the proper marking of the position of each of the commands of the Regular Army engaged at Gettysburg, and for the purchase, restoration, and care of grounds and care of monuments, under the direction of the Gettysburg Battlefield Memorial Association, reported them favorably and moved their reference to the Committeee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bill and joint resolution, reported them adversely, and moved their indefinite postponement; which was agreed to:

A bill (S. 2221) for the relief of chaplains in the Army of the United States; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 71) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to loan tents to the Southwestern Iowa and Northwestern Missouri Veteran Soldier's Association, for reunion purposes.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1529) for the relief of Holman Anderson, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2484) appropriating $25,000 in aid of a Volunteer Disabled Soldier's Home in the State of Vermont, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following petitions, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

The petition of George H. Boyd, late second lieutenant Company H, Eleventh Ohio Cavalry Volunteers, praying that he be allowed pay from the time of his discharge by special order to the time of the honorable discharge of his company;

The petition of ex-soldiers of Decatur, Ill., praying for an amendment to the act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men; and

The petition of Pleasant D. Powers, of Tennessee, praying for correction of muster to show disability in line of duty.

Mr. CAMERON. I am also instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred sundry petitions favoring the passage of the equalization of bounty bills, to report them back and ask that they lie on the table, as a bill on that subject is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 845) for the relief of telegraph operators during the war, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 841) conferring military rank on telegraph operators in the military service, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2902) for the relief of Commodore W. T. Truxton, to report it without amendment. No written report has been filed, but the facts are all stated in the preamble of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4981) to provide for the settlement of an account with the Vicksburg and Meridian Railroad Company for internal-revenue tax, and to refund the amount of said tax erroneously assessed and collected, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. WALTHALL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 633) for the relief of Maj. G. W. Candee, to report it favorably without amendment. A Senate bill, of which this is an exact copy, passed the Senate on the 8th day of July last.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2252) granting a pension to Susan A. Duncan;

A bill (H. R. 9167) granting a pension to Joseph F. Kirkhart;
A bill (H. R. 356) granting a pension to Lucinda Barrett;
A bill (H. R. 7540) to increase the pension of Franklin Sweet; and
A bill (H. R. 927) granting a pension to Cudberth Stone.

Mr. SAWYER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2161) to increase the pension of Mrs. Rebecca A. Craw, to submit an adverse report thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2174) to equalize the pensions paid to soldiers and sailors who became totally disabled, reported it with amendments and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8869) granting a pension to Mrs. Henrietta M. Drum Hunt, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8623) granting a pension to Mary E. Hedrick, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1860) granting a pension to Frederick Robertson, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Pennsylvania. I am also instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2606) granting a pension to Frederick Robertson, to report it back, and, inasmuch as this bill covers the same claim as the previous bill, I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 79) for the relief of Pryor N. Lea, reported it without amendment, and submitted no written report, the committee adopting the report of the House Committee.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Clara G. Scott and other citizens of New York, praying for certain relief in behalf of Clara G. Scott for services rendered to the sick and wounded soldiers of the Federal Army during the war of the rebellion, &c., asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred an amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. WILLIAMS to the sundry civil appropriation bill, submitted a favorable report thereon; and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9918) to provide for grading and paving the approaches to the national cemetery near Danville, Va., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the bill (S. 2671) granting one condemned cannon to the Grand Army Post at Mount Ayr, Iowa, and the bill (S. 2880) donating condemned cast-iron cannon and cannon-balls for monumental purposes, have instructed me to report the same back adversely, recommending that the bills be indefinitely postponed.

This report is made in pursuance of the uniform action of the Committee on Military Affairs as shown by Report No. 1007, Forty-seventh Congress, second session, Reports Nos. 248, 249, 251, 252, 506, and 507 in the Forty-eighth Congress, and Report No. 20 in the Forty-ninth Congress. All these reports have been adverse upon the ground that there are no more condemned cannon to be presented for any such purpose or for any other purpose. I move that the bills be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1143) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the Somerville Grand Army of the Republic, of Somerville, Mass., four condemned gun-carriages, to be used for monumental purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

GROUNDS IN SAN ANTONIO, TEX.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6313) to release unto the city of San Antonio, Tex., for its use as a public thoroughfare, certain portions of the military reservation near said city, have instructed me to report the same back to the Senate favorably, recommending the passage of the bill without amendment.

This bill originated upon a memorial of the city authorities of San Antonio, presented to the commanding general, Stanley, at that place and sent through the regular military channels. The commanding officer there, the Quartermaster-General, the Secretary of War, and all the military authorities have recommended the passage of the bill opening up a street there with the limitations stated in their communication. The House bill adopted the limitations which they recommended.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] is very anxious to have the bill acted upon at this time. I ask that the report may be printed at the proper time.

Mr. COKE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now considered. It is very important to the city of San Antonio and it meets the concurrence of all parties concerned. It is simply for the extension of a street across a military reservation.

By unanimous consent, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF PUBLIC PRINTER.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back the report of the Public Printer. This report comes to us under the requirements of the statute and contains a great deal of matter that is of value only if printed. The committee therefore direct me to recommend that it be printed under the rule of the usual number, and I ask that that order be now made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska, from the Committee on Printing, moves that the report of the Public Printer be printed—the usual number only. That order will be made if there be no objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3114) to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by the failure of said company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3115) granting a pension to Reuben Brownmiller; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 3116) for the relief of night inspectors of the ports of New York and Baltimore; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 3117) for the relief of Gilbert Thompson, Veronica Ulke, Julia F. Laskey, and F. G. Barbadoes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MCPHERSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BUREAU CONTINGENT FUNDS.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the heads of the several Departments of the Treasury, Interior, War, and Navy, the Department of Justice, and of Agriculture are directed to transmit to the Senate the estimates for the contingent fund of each bureau in each of said Departments respectively, showing the sum of money required for the contingent fund of each of said bureaus respectively.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Why does the Senator omit the Department of State?

Mr. MORGAN. Is the Department of State omitted? I intended to insert it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerks inform the Chair that the Department of State is omitted.

Mr. MORGAN. It was omitted by mistake. Let it be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that amendment will be made. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4806) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River at the foot of Pennsylvania avenue east; and

A bill (H. R. 9125) to create a school board for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 634) relating to sales for taxes in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. 766) for the relief of Francis Denmead;

A bill (S. 1130) to exempt from taxation all property held by the trustees of the Corcoran Gallery of Art, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 1188) to exempt the property of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington, D. C., from taxation;

A bill (S. 1882) to repeal parts of an act relating to tax on the business of real-estate agents in the District of Columbia, approved June 20, 1872;

A bill (S. 2037) for the relief of Mary Anna Eagan; and

A bill (S. 2600) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to make police regulations for the government of said District.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, each with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. 228) for the erection of a public building at Camden, N. J.;

A bill (S. 1212) for the further protection of property from fire and for the safety of lives in the District of Columbia; and

A bill (S. 1213) to regulate insurance in the District of Columbia.

SETTLERS AND PURCHASERS OF LANDS IN NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. MANDERSON. There was placed on the Calendar, under the head of special orders, on the motion of my colleague [Mr. VAN WYCK], a short time ago, the bill (H. R. 1413) for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas. It was made a special order for this morning. I am satisfied that that bill will not lead to extended debate, and will take but a very short time. I hold in my hand a petition signed by thirty-six parties who are interested in those lands, urging that the relief which they have sought for many years shall be granted. I ask the indulgence of the Senate that the bill may be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. DOLPH. If that bill is taken up by consent I wish to reserve the right to object if it leads to debate. I have given notice that I wish to submit some remarks this morning on a resolution heretofore offered by me.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think it will not lead to any lengthy debate.

Mr. DOLPH. I shall not object if it takes no time.

Mr. PLATT. I understood from the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] the other day, that he desired to say something upon the bill. If he does not know that it is to be taken up at this time, I think, perhaps, it ought not to be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not open to debate.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to make a suggestion. I am going to send word to the committee-room of the Senator from Vermont, and if he should come in and interpose an objection, of course that would be the end of the consideration of the bill this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon did give notice of his intention to call up this morning, for the purpose of making some remarks, a resolution submitted by him.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand, however, that the Senator from Oregon does not object to the consideration of this bill, provided it does not lead to debate.

Mr. PLATT. I do not object to it; I only made the suggestion I did because of the absence of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MANDERSON. I referred to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. PLUMB. The bill certainly can not lead to much debate. It has already passed the Senate once and passed the committee twice. I think it will lead to no debate whatever. It is a very important bill to a large number of persons.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1413) for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read at length.

Mr. PLUMB. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I should be very glad to hear from the Senator from Nebraska a statement of the provisions of the bill. What is the purpose of it?

Mr. MANDERSON. This is a bill which has already, substantially in the form that it is now presented by the Committee on Public Lands, on two different occasions passed the Senate. It concerns a large number of public-land settlers who settled upon lands known afterward as a grant of lands to the Denver and Saint Joseph Railroad. After these parties had lived upon their property for many years, had paid the Government price of the lands, and had obtained the Government patent therefor, the railroad grant was declared a paramount and better title; and they were compelled to purchase from the grantees of the railroad company the lands for which they had already paid, and received the patent of the Government of the United States. It is a matter which is quite familiar to all of the Public Lands Committee, and it is simply an effort to make these people whole under the covenants of the deed received by them from the Government.

Mr. CALL. What does the bill provide? The bill provides, I understand, that they may re-enter.

Mr. PLUMB. It provides for their payment.

Mr. MANDERSON. It provides for refunding to them the amount paid on the basis of three and a half dollars per acre, being the amount of expenditure that they were compelled to make under the grant of land to the railroad company.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to the bill. I only wished to know whether this case had been decided against these people in the courts.

Mr. MANDERSON. It had been, by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. BERRY. I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska or the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], if this is the bill growing out of the decision in the case of Van Wyck vs. Knevals?

Mr. MANDERSON. It is. That is the case that went to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. BERRY. Was the amendment adopted which was proposed by the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to move a reconsideration of the vote on the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is in order.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate reconsider its action upon the adoption of the amendment. If there be no objection, the motion to reconsider will be considered as agreed to, and the amendment will be again submitted. Does the Senator desire to have it read?

Mr. BERRY. Yes, sir, let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and to insert:

That for the purpose of reimbursing persons, and the grantees, heirs, and devisees of persons, who, under the homestead, pre-emption, or other laws, settled upon or purchased lands within the grant made by an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas Railroad and Telegraph," approved July 23, 1866, and to whom patents have been issued therefor, but against which persons, or their grantees, heirs or devisees, decrees have been rendered by the United States circuit court on account of the priority of said grant made in the act above entitled, the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as shall be required for said purpose, is hereby appropriated: Provided, however, That no part of said sum shall be paid to any one of said parties until he shall have filed with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of the said decree, duly certified, and also a certificate of the judge of said court rendering the same to the effect that such decree was rendered in a bona fide controversy between a plaintiff showing title under the grant made in said act and a defendant holding the patent or holding by deed under the patentee, and that the decision was in favor of the plaintiff on the ground of the priority of the grant made by said act to the filing, settlement, or purchase by the defendant or his grantor; and said claimant shall also file with the said decree and certificate a bill of the costs in such case, duly certified by the clerk and judge of said court. Thereupon it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to adjust the amount due to each defendant on the basis of $3.50 per acre for the tract his title to which shall have failed as aforesaid, and the costs appearing by the bill thereof. He shall then make a requisition upon the Treasury for the sum found to be due to such claimant, or his heirs and devisees or assigns, and shall pay the same to him, taking such release, acquittance, or discharge as shall forever bar any further claim against the United States on account of the failure of the title as aforesaid.

Mr. BERRY. The bill as it passed the House provided that those who entered these lands under the pre-emption or homestead laws should receive back three dollars and a half per acre, the amount alleged to have been paid to the railroad companies by way of compromise. The House bill however provided that those who had made cash entries at a dollar and a quarter an acre should only receive back one dollar and a quarter an acre, the amount that they paid for the lands.

The universal rule, as I understand, of the Government from its foundation, has been that, wherever the title to lands conveyed by the Government failed, the Government was liable only for the amount of money received, without interest. Several hundred acres of these lands were purchased at a dollar and a quarter an acre. Why an exception should be made and these parties paid three dollars and a half per acre, while every other person who has purchased land from the United States Government and the title failed only received one dollar and a quarter per acre, the amount that was originally paid for the land, I can not understand. I should be glad if the Senator from Nebraska would give some reason why these parties should be placed upon a footing superior to that of all parties who have purchased lands from the Government the title to which has failed.

The parties purchased this land, and by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States it was determined to be the land of the railroad company. They claim now that they were compelled to pay the railroad company, by way of compromise, three dollars and a half an acre. The Senate committee amendment to the House bill proposes to pay what they claim they paid the railroad company. Whether that was a fair and just price for the land I do not know, but I do know that the rule of the Department and the universal rule of the Government is that the Government only warrants the title to the extent of the purchase-money and no further, and if these parties are to be paid three dollars and a half an acre where they only paid a dollar and a quarter an acre, then the same rule ought to prevail in regard to all other lands.

I am therefore opposed to the Senate committee amendment and in favor of the bill as it passed the House. In the case of the party who entered under pre-emption and homestead, that is a different matter; but the bill as passed by the House only allows those who made cash entries at a dollar and a quarter an acre to receive back the same amount that they paid the Government, and no more. I therefore hope the Senate committee amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the effect of the Senate committee amendment?

Mr. BERRY. The effect of the amendment is to pay back to these parties $3.50 an acre where they only paid the Government $1.25 an acre.

Mr. MANDERSON. But, if the Senator will permit the suggestion, these same parties who paid $1.25 an acre to the Government of the United States have been compelled to pay $3.50 an acre to the grantees of the railroad company. It seems to me it is no more than just and equitable that they should be refunded the amount which they have been compelled to pay by reason of the failure of the grant of the Government.

Mr. BERRY. I will state again that there is a large number of cases before the Departments every day where from time to time parties purchased land twenty, thirty, or forty years ago, and paid a dollar and a quarter, fifty cents, or twelve and a half cents an acre, and where the title failed, the Government invariably only refunds the amount of money which they originally paid. In many cases they have made large and valuable improvements. Nevertheless the Government refuses to give compensation. The rule has been all the while to simply pay back the purchase-money without interest.

If it be just in this case that these parties should make their own contract with the railroad company and come to the Government, and the Government refunds what they saw proper to pay the railroad company, then it ought to be so in every other case where the title of the Government has failed. I say that there should be no difference in the treatment of these parties and all other citizens. They purchased this land at a dollar and a quarter an acre. Whether they were compelled to pay the railroad company $3.50 or any other sum I do not know; but the rule ought to be uniform, and these parties ought not to receive $3.50 an acre where they only paid out $1.25 an acre, and where other parties are compelled to receive back only $1.25 an acre. I object to making a difference between this and all other cases in what has been the uniform and constant practice of the Government, and that is my objection to the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANDERSON. It seems to me that the Senator from Arkansas loses sight of some of the equities of the situation. It is true that the parties sought to be relieved by this bill are of two classes, those who took the land under the homestead and pre-emption laws of the United States, and others who made purchase at $1.25 per acre. Those who bought and paid for the land, being those whom we call purchasers as distinguished from homesteaders and pre-emptors, really paid more to the Government than those who homesteaded and pre-empted; but when they came to purchase the land from the railroad company, or the grantee of the railroad company, Mr. Knevals, none of them paid, as I understand, less than $3.50 an acre. Some of them paid as high as $8 and $10 per acre to the grantee of the railroad company. The bill, however, limits the compensation to them at not exceeding $3.50 per acre.

The parties, whether homesteaders or purchasers, went upon these lands after patent obtained from the United States, which certainly should be the highest guarantee of title. They made upon the lands valuable improvements, in most cases the improvements exceeding the value of the land itself. They occupied the lands for many years, from ten to twelve years, and it was after such occupancy and the making of such improvements and the payment of taxes during all those years that the title of the Government failed. It seems to me that no strict rule of law but that which equitably flows out of the covenants of the warranty deed of the United States Government should apply in this case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have you not a betterment law in Nebraska?

Mr. MANDERSON. We have a betterment law in the State of Nebraska.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I may interrupt the Senator, then if they have a betterment law there, as they have in Vermont, and ought to have everywhere, these people will get an allowance for the betterments they have put on the land.

Mr. MANDERSON. They would in the event of litigation with the grantee of the railroad company.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If they proceeded to settle with the railroad company at the price they chose to settle at, the question is whether they have a right to ask the Congress of the United States, and the people of the United States, out of the Treasury, to indorse their settlement, until we know a good deal more about how they settled, and on what terms, than we do now. There is the difficulty. If they had stood a lawsuit and called on the Government to defend its patent and they had then been ejected, the proper allowance being made for their betterment, then we should be bound undoubtedly to make them good, like anybody else who issues a patent properly, unless the patent was so obviously illegal that they would know that the Secretary of the Interior had no business to issue it at all. But the trouble is here that the railway company setting up a claim, these people chose to go and make terms on their private account without the United States having an opportunity to be heard at all.

In that state of the case it seems to me that the observations of the Senator from Arkansas are sound; that in such a state of things all that the United States can do or can be asked to do is to return the money which was paid for the land, the title of which has failed, and if they have chosen to settle on their own account at a loss, that is their affair.

Mr. MANDERSON. I suggest——

Mr. GEORGE. Allow me to ask the Senator from Vermont a question.

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont if it is not the universal rule in transactions between private parties that upon a breach of warranty title the obligation of the vendor is limited simply to the terms of the purchase-money and interest?

Mr. MANDERSON. May I respond to the Senator from Mississippi and at the same time to the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont?

If the strict rule of law was applied to these contending parties, the Government of the United States on the one hand and these settlers and purchasers upon the other, the relief afforded to them would be less than the relief in this bill, for, take a dollar and a quarter an acre, the amount paid by the purchaser, with interest at 6 per cent. during all these years, with the taxes paid, and it exceeds the amount of three and a half dollars an acre; but I do not place my demand for this relief upon any such narrow ground.

I say that the Government of the United States, when it gives patent to settlers or purchasers situated as these people are, and sees the sad experience that they have had in connection with the failure of their title to their lands, can afford to be more than just. It should be generous; it should at least make some effort to make them whole.

I have here a petition that I received but yesterday, and it is for this reason and because of my personal knowledge of the difficulties attending the situation and of the status of these parties that I have urged the consideration of the bill this morning. This petition is very numerously signed by those who homesteaded and purchased and are occupying these lands:

We, the undersigned, would respectfully represent that we are owners and occupants of the lands along the old Saint Joe and Denver Railroad, known as the Knevals lands, and we earnestly request that you will use your best endeavors to secure the passage of a bill for our relief and reimbursing us for what we have expended to buy in the railroad title; and we further request that such bill shall give equal right to both settlers and purchasers.

This is signed very numerously. There is equity, right, and justice in this bill, and nothing but that. I therefore ask its passage.

Mr. PLUMB. There are a number of circumstances that ought to be taken into account in considering the action to be taken in the present case.

The Government does not warrant title; consequently there is no redress on the part of any purchaser from the Government who is affected. This land was patented by the Government at a time when the relations of the Government to railroad grants were imperfectly understood. A good deal of it passed through the hands of two or three different persons, of course by means of warranty deeds; but the shifting character of the population of that Western frontier was such that the grantees of the patents of the Government and who became the grantors to purchasers, could not be found, and there was no remedy on the warranty. The persons who purchased the land went into possession chiefly; nearly all the land became improved. It had been taxed for a good many years and the taxes had been paid. Under the statute of limitations in most of the Western States, in Kansas, at all events, and I think also in Nebraska, after the lapse of five years the taxes can not be recovered from the county to which they were paid. These persons had paid taxes which they can not recover. The title having failed the lands were not legally taxable, and therefore the money which they paid for taxes was so much lost to them. They were under constraint to deal with the railroad company to get title. They had to do so. They could go back on somebody, perhaps, under the occupying claimant law, for the purpose of recovering the value of improvements, but that would be in most cases utterly without result. It is simply a question now whether the Government will in a small measure compensate these people for the damage which actually resulted to them by reason of the invalid conveyance it gave them and on which they relied.

It does not assimilate itself, except in a very remote degree, to the transactions between private parties, because the Government cannot be sued. These people have been for years, not suing the Government and getting judgment against it, as would have been the case if they had dealt with private parties, but beseeching Congress to pass this bill; and if you would add to the dollar and a quarter an acre the interest which has accumulated since the time when they made profert of their claim to Congress, I think it would amount to about three dollars and a half an acre, the amount claimed.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas a question, if he will permit. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas, before he takes his seat, if the universal custom and practice of the Government has not been and is not to-day to refund the purchase-money, only, in similar cases; and if we pay these parties three dollars and a half an acre, will it not be establishing a new rule, different from the uniform practice of the Government from time immemorial?

Mr. PLUMB. There is no practice in the Interior Department that assimilates to this at all. Wherever the Government by the mistake of its officials assumes to convey title which remains in such a condition that they can themselves revoke it, they then pay back the money as the only penalty of the mistake they have made. But this is a case where the title was issued and put beyond the reach of the Interior Department or the reach of the decision of any authority except that of the courts, which finally did decide that the title was not in the Government, but was in the railroad company, and consequently the patent was invalid. That was only determined after long litigation, carried on at the expense of the settlers, so that it is not at all like the case of a man who deals with the Interior Department directly and gets his money back without any costs.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there not a general law, and has it not been in force for many years, under which the patentee of a tract of land whose title has failed can make a quit-claim to the Government and receive back his purchase-money?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know of any such law as that.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is a general law, and there is a general appropriation, and it is being done every year. Where a party has a patent to land, and that patent was issued by mistake, and a prior title emanating from the Government has taken the land, and he makes proof of that fact and offers a quit-claim of whatever title may have been given to him by the Government under the patent, he gets back his dollar and a quarter, or whatever he paid.

Mr. PLUMB. That would not be parallel to this case, because this is a case where there was a serious question as to whether the title was in the Government at the time of the issuing of the patent, which could only be settled by the courts. The Interior Department held that it had the right to issue the patent, and consequently it would not have paid back the money to the parties even if they had asked it. It could not have done so without stultifying itself. It was not a question of mistake, such as sometimes arises in the affairs of the Interior Department, but it was a question as to whether a certain grant had attached at a time before the plat had been filed in the local land office.

Mr. CALL. The point that I had in my mind was not whether three dollars and a half an acre should be paid to these settlers, as between the Government and the settler. I think that the rule should be in such cases to furnish some reasonable compensation to the man who has purchased lands from the Government and improved them and the title of the Government has failed. Consequently I do not object to the payment of the three dollars and a half.

But the fact is, that all the equities, as well as the express provision of the act in the original grant, were in favor of the actual settler under the Government up to the period of the location of the grant; that was the period of time at which the grant acquired its precedence over the rights of future settlers, and there has been the opportunity for a great deal of wrong to the actual settler.

The question presented by this bill is whether if by litigation, without any intervention on the part of the Government, the settler is ejected, the Government shall respond in damages. The case may be merely collusive, and a decree may be rendered in favor of the parties owning, or, rather, claiming to own, these grants, and those making the decrees, so far from being judges, are rather the agents or instruments of those who are interested in these grants, who render decrees and orders against the Government and in the interest of the parties who promote this litigation.

While I am very desirous and very willing to vote for this compensation to these settlers and think it entirely right, I desire that it should be clearly understood, and the provisions of the bill require that there should have been an honest, bona fide decision in which the interests of the Government and the validity of the settlers' rights under the laws have been properly vindicated. I am advised of the fact that there has been throughout the country an extensive use of the courts of the United States to preclude justice to the actual settler of the country by decrees which have no foundation in law or in equity or in public right. I desire that Congress shall carefully avoid any action which will conceal or confirm this action. I desire that the full light of day shall be shed on all such cases, and those who are parties to them shall be held to a full responsibility for them. So far as these purchasers or settlers on the land are concerned, I think they ought to be compensated, and the price does not seem to me to be unreasonable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it seems to me that the grounds on which this amendment is attempted to be supported show the impropriety of the amendment itself. The principle alleged is that we must reimburse these settlers for the sums that they have been obliged, as it is said, to pay the railroad company in order to hold their lands and to get a quit-claim from the railroad company. If that is a correct principle then this amendment is wrong, if it be true, as it is stated, that some of these settlers, as they are called, some of these purchasers from the United States, have paid more than the amount per acre that this amendment provides for.

If, therefore, the principle of reimbursement of the sums that each settler has paid to the railroad company is the sound one, we must provide that we will reimburse each of these grantees the amount that he has been compelled to pay the railroad, and if a man has been compelled to pay $5 in a given case because the land was rich and fertile and with water on it, we must pay him $5; but if there is another man who has only paid $3, why should we pay him three dollars and a half? I do not see any answer to that.

But now let us look at the thing itself. Here is a grantee from the United States with a patent on a purchase at a dollar and a quarter an acre. He enters into possession, has the benefit of the use and occupation of the land for ten years, I will say. Then it turns out that his title has failed and that another party is the real owner of the land. He proceeds to buy off the other party for three dollars and a half an acre. What has he paid for? He has paid of his own free will not more than the value of the property he wants. He has got the value of his three dollars and a half in the property that he has bought from the railroad, has he not, if not more? Undoubtedly a great deal more. Where is he out of pocket? He is out of pocket by precisely the sum that he paid the original patentor, the United States, for that land and for any loss that he may have suffered meantime. What loss has he suffered meantime? Does anybody say that the use of this land would not pay the interest on a dollar and a quarter an acre during the occupation of the occupier who bought it finally from the railroad at the price that it was worth? It seems to me that there is no answer to that.

So then upon principles of common justice between man and man, as the Senator from Mississippi says, the rule of just damages would be in a case of that kind to repay to the purchaser or the holder of the land the sum of money that he paid for it where he had bought without a consideration, as it turned out. Then we come to the question of interest, that, as between man and man, would be allowed unless the intervening occupation that he had had, which he has not paid for, would be worth as much or more than the interest. So it does seem to me, with great respect to the Senator from Kansas and to the Senator from Nebraska, whom I should be glad to concur with, that this amendment is improper in principle, contrary to the practice of the Government, and is unjust to the Treasury of the United States.

I do not care to refer to what has been stated to me somewhere and at some time about the peculiar circumstances under which these purchasers came in, making, as it has been stated, a hasty race to get to that land office before the action of the Interior Department here could reach it, knowing that the land was going to be withdrawn; and therefore the claim would not have a very great deal of merit in morals if that were true. I do not know that it is; but I have heard some such story as that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BERRY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken.

Mr. VANCE. My colleague [Mr. RANSOM] is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] on all political questions.

Mr. CAMDEN. My colleague [Mr. KENNA] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER], both of whom are absent.

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired for to-day with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]. I do not know how he would vote on this question. The pair extends to questions where we would probably differ.

Mr. VANCE. On this question I do not know how my colleague would vote if he were present.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I shall allow my vote to stand.

Mr. COKE. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. MAXEY], now on his way to Texas. He is paired, generally, on political questions with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES]. I do not know how my colleague would vote on this question if he were present.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—31.

Allison,	Cullom,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Sherman,
Blackburn,	Dawes,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Spooner,
Blair,	Dolph,	Morrill,	Stanford,
Brown,	Evarts,	Palmer,	Teller,

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing vote.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. PLUMB, Mr. TELLER, and Mr. BERRY were appointed.

COLUMBIA RIVER BOAT RAILWAY.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that the resolution introduced by me some days since, instructing the Secretary of War to examine the point on the Columbia River known as The Dalles, now on the table, be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution heretofore submitted by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. DOLPH December 9, 1886:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to examine and report as to the necessity for the improvement of that portion of the Columbia River known as "The Dalles," by the removal of obstructions so as to permit the free navigation thereof; and as to the practicability and probable cost of overcoming such obstructions to navigation by the construction of a steamboat railway around The Dalles and Celilo Rapids, and removing obstructions at Three-Mile and Ten-Mile Rapids.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, if the subject of overcoming obstructions to navigation in our navigable rivers by means of boat railways were not comparatively new, I should not occupy the time of the Senate uponthis resolution. I hope by the remarks which I shall submit to attract the attention of the Senate to the project, in particular, of overcoming the rapids known as The Dalles of the Columbia by means of a boat railway, and generally to the subject of the practicability and economy of overcoming similar obstructions to navigation in the navigable waters of the United States by means of railways by which loaded vessels shall be lifted from the navigable waters on one side of the obstructions and speedily and safely transported and deposited in the navigable waters on the other side. The importance of improving the Columbia River at the point mentioned is beyond dispute. I do not propose to enter at any considerable length upon a discussion of the urgency for and necessity of the improvement of that great water way.

The first speech of any length I made in this body was upon the improvement of that river, and both my colleague and myself, and others who have represented the State of Oregon in this body, have from time to time fully presented that subject to the Senate. I shall content myself with stating briefly the situation, so that the urgency for the particular improvement referred to in the resolution will be apparent as an argument for the adoption of some plan for overcoming the obstructions at the point indicated, which can be speedily executed.

The Columbia River, of the rivers in the United States, is second in magnitude only to the Mississippi. It is 1,400 miles in length and is navigable, with interruptions which may be removed without difficulty, for a thousand miles from its mouth. It receives numerous navigable tributaries, the principal being the Willamette, entering at about 110 miles from its mouth and navigable for 130 miles, and the Snake, entering at about 386 miles from its mouth and navigable for 180 miles. The Columbia is navigable, with two interruptions—at the Cascades Rapids, at which the Government is constructing a canal and locks, and The Dalles rapids, where it is proposed to construct a boat railway—to Priest Rapids, a distance of 409 miles from its mouth; and by the Snake River to the Grande Ronde River, 30 miles above Lewiston, a distance of 516 miles from the sea, making a total of navigable water in the Columbia and Snake Rivers below Priest Rapids of 589; and steamboats have been successfully navigated on the Snake River to a distance of 80 miles above Lewiston. The drainage area of the Columbia is estimated at 244,959 square miles, divided as follows:

	Square miles.
Snake River	104,604
Upper Columbia, above Snake	97,155
Main Columbia, below junction with Snake	43,200
Total	244,959

This area is larger than the aggregate area of all the New England and Middle States, with Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia added. The situation of the people residing in that portion of the Columbia basin east of the Cascade Mountains, which is by far the greater part of the vast area drained by the Columbia River, is peculiar and extraordinary. They are effectually cut off from an outlet to the sea, except through the gorge of the Columbia, by the Cascade range of mountains, extending from the northern boundary of Washington Territory southerly entirely across Washington and Oregon. Through these mountains no other pass exists through which it can reasonably be hoped to divert the commerce of this region to any considerable extent from its present channel along the Columbia River. It has been well said that "'the longest way around' through this horizontal pass will always be a shorter haul than any other line plus the vertical distance over the mountains." This pass is substantially controlled by a single company which owns a railroad upon the Oregon side of the river, a portage railroad upon the north side of the rapids, and the principal if not all the boats engaged in navigating the Upper Columbia; and thus, without competition, is enabled to make and maintain its own rates of freights and fares.

As a consequence of this condition of affairs the freight rates, both by river and by rail, between the interior and the seaboard are enormously high. I think it is doubtful if in any other portion of the United States the cost of transportation is so great; certainly not in any portion affording an equal amount of business for transportation lines. My colleague, in a speech delivered in the Senate on the 10th of July last, fully presented the subject of "The exorbitant nature of transportation tariffs on the products of the Columbia basin," citing numerous instances of local rates upon grain and merchandise and comparing them with charges elsewhere. I will not repeat what he so ably said upon that subject. It is sufficient to say that, owing to the peculiar situation I have described, the producers of the Upper Columbia basin are subjected to a tax in the nature of exorbitant transportation rates upon their products to the seaboard which is a most serious hinderance to the prosperity of the country and calls for prompt action by the General Government and for relief by the early removal of obstructions to navigation in the Columbia, both at the Cascades and at The Dalles.

In his report of an examination of the Upper Columbia River and the territory in its vicinity, in September and October, 1881, Lieutenant Symons, referring to the benefits to be derived from the improvement of the Upper Columbia, said:

It is scarcely worth while for me to enlarge on the general benefit to the whole North Columbian basin which would be conferred by removing all the obstructions and giving through river navigation from Grand Rapids to the sea.

The continued, earnest, and united efforts of other countries and sections to obtain water transportation to the seaboard by means of rivers and canals sufficiently attest the estimation in which it is held by the people, and its value and importance are clearly shown by all the navigable rivers and internal water routes of the world.

The Government of the United States has commenced the improvement of the Columbia at the first obstruction, the Cascades; it has taken the preliminary steps toward the improvement at The Dalles, and it will ere long be called upon to commence the improvement at Priest Rapids and the upper rapids to give a continuously navigable river.

If we take a glance forward to the time when all this eastern portion of Washington Territory shall be settled, when the whole land shall be a waving field of grain, with here and there a village or a city; with railroads traversing the country in every direction, and a vast commerce being carried on between the sea and the interior; if we picture to ourselves all this with the Columbia in its present state of interrupted navigability, and then picture it with the river completely navigable from the Grand Rapids to its mouth, we shall be able in some degree to appreciate the importance of undertaking and completing the great works of improvement needed on the river.

The picture here drawn by Lieutenant Symons will be realized sooner than even he imagined. Already railroads have been constructed and are being constructed to supply transportation facilities to every fertile portion of this vast region; grain fields cover tens of thousands of acres where then the soil had never been vexed by the labor of the husbandman, and the time when "the whole land shall be a waving field of grain" is at hand; villages and cities have sprung up where then there were no signs of civilization, and a vast commerce is already carried on upon the bosom and along the banks of the Columbia between the interior and the sea. An energetic, thrifty, and industrious population are fast transforming the uncultivated waste into fertile farms and comfortable homes.

I have recently received a communication from a committee of the Board of Trade of Dalles City, Oreg., which, although it does not refer directly to the subject of river improvements, will help to a correct understanding of the condition of the transportation problem in that region. It is as follows:

THE DALLES, OREG., December 29, 1886.

SIR: On behalf of the Board of Trade of Dalles City, we desire to call your attention to the situation of the merchants of this city and other cities in Eastern Oregon and Washington, on the line of the Oregon and Navigation Company's Railway, respecting freight rates from eastern points.

The schedule of rates to these way points upon all classes of freights from the east is made up by adding to the through rate to Portland the local rate back from Portland to the way point. This additional local back rate is an arbitrary charge, and is in no way connected with the through rate.

For example: A car-load of merchandise to any of these way points from Chicago is delivered at the way point without going through to Portland, and the freight charges thereon consist of the full through rate to Portland, plus the local rate on merchandise from Portland to the way point. In the case of our own city this local rate from Portland is on the average from 70 per cent. to 80 per cent. of what is charged for hauling the same merchandise from Chicago te Portland. The distance from this city to Portland is 88 miles. The local rato from Portland to this point, on the average, is 45 cents per 100 pounds. The through rate from Chicago to Portland on the same class of freight is 65 cents per 100 pounds, making the rate from Chicago to this point $1.10 per 100 pounds; and yet we are nearer Chicago by 88 miles than is Portland, and are on the direct line between those two points.

In the case of merchants east of us the situation is worse. Thus at Arlington, a point 141 miles east of Portland, the local back rate is on the average 70 cents per 100 pounds; that is 5 cents more than the through freight rate to Portland from Chicago; making the actual charge to that point from Chicago, $1.35 per 100 pounds. In the case of Walla Walla, Wash., Baker City, and Huntington, Oreg., the local back rate is double the through rate to Portland. Yet the actual haul in each of the cases referred to falls considerably short of the haul for which is paid the through rate alone. Concerning this through rate no complaint is made, and merchants at the way points are entirely willing to pay the same rates as are charged for the haul to Portland. But the arbitrary local back rate charged is deemed a most unjust and burdensome exaction, falling little short of systematic robbery.

In like manner merchants at these way points are compelled to pay on shipments to Chicago, in addition to the through rate from Portland to Chicago, the local rate from the way point to Portland. Thus the railway company exact from dealers at these way points on all shipments to and from all Eastern points a charge equal to what they would be entitled to charge if they were compelled to haul the freight first to Portland. But no such necessity exists, and for this excessive arbitrary charge no service whatever is rendered.

If the bill now pending before Congress known as the "interstate-commerce bill" gives us relief from this unjust and burdensome discrimination we would respectively request you to co-operate with our other Representatives in Congress in securing its passage. If not, we earnestly hope you will endeavor to procure such other legislation as will relieve us.

We call the attention of Hons. J. H. MITCHELL and BINGER HERMANN to the same subject by a similar communication.

Yours very truly,

E. B. McFARLAND,
A. S. MACALLISTER,
B. S. HUNTINGTON,
Committee on behalf of the Board of Trade of Dalles City.

Hon. J. N. DOLPH,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

The Cascade branch of the Northern Pacific, now fast nearing completion, will tap the basin of the Upper Columbia, in Eastern Washington, and, in connection with the main line of that road, will afford a competing line for a considerable portion of that region, and will no doubt prove an important factor in the regulation of freights and fares; but permanent competition can not be secured where there is a chance for combination. I have no faith in legislation proving effectual to sufficiently regulate, reduce and control freights; but water transportation, wherever it comes in competition with railroad traffic, according to the opinion of the best informed men upon the subject, and as is also corroborated by the experience of this and other countries, is an effectual means of reducing and regulating the cost of transportation.

The special committee on interstate commerce, of which the Senator from Illinois is chairman, investigated this subject in connection with the question of interstate commerce, and made an interesting and valuable report. A distinguished array of eminent and well-informed witnesses gave concurrent testimony before the committee to the effect that we must depend upon our water ways for competition with the railroads.

The committee conclude their report as follows:

THE EFFECT OF WATER COMPETITION UPON RAILROAD CHARGES.

The evidence before the committee accords with the experience of all nations in recognizing the water routes as the most effective cheapeners and regulators of railway charges. Their influence is not confined within the limits of the territory immediately accessible to water communication, but extends and controls railroad rates at such remote and interior points as have competing lines reaching means of transport by water. Competition between railroads sooner or later leads to combination or consolidation, but neither can prevail or secure unreasonable rates in the face of direct competition with free natural or artificial water routes.

The conclusion of the committee is, therefore, that natural or artificial channels of communication by water, when favorably located, adequately improved, and properly maintained, afford the cheapest method of long-distance transportation now known, and that they must continue to exercise in the future, as they have invariably exercised in the past, an absolutely controlling and beneficially regulating influence upon the charges made upon any and all other means of transit.

The Northern Pacific Railroad Company is authorized by its charter to construct its road down the Columbia River from Wallula Junction to Portland, and it is rumored that the Canadian Pacific Company is considering the proposition of building a branch or connecting line down this same river. But even if both these roads should be constructed, that would not afford adequate relief to the producers and consumers of the great Columbia basin. Competition sufficient to reduce the rates to a just limit is not likely to be so secured, and it is even probable that the people might find, after the roads were built, that they were subject to increased burdens to enable the competing companies to pay operating expenses and fixed charges upon the outlay for the construction of their roads. Let the Columbia River be opened and be made navigable without interruption, by the removal of obstructions, so that boats can descend from the British Columbia line to its mouth, and no section of the country will have cheaper transportation. The railroad companies will be compelled to reduce freight rates, or the portions of that region not reached by the navigable waters of the Columbia and its tributaries will soon be made accessible by means of short lines of railroad terminating at the river, and the products of the country will be sent to tide water by steamboats.

The people are in favor of the improvement of the great water-ways and making them, as far as practicable, the means of transportation. It is not those alone who reside in the immediate vicinity of the great rivers who favor liberal appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, but the people of all parts of the country: the producers and consumers, alike, begin to understand that they are benefited by everything which reduces the cost of transportation in any portion of the country. Transportation is a great tax upon both producer and consumer, and cheap freights is a question of common interest to both. Let no man be mistaken upon this subject. The great West and the South are in favor of the improvement of our rivers and harbors. They demand that the water ways of the country shall be free to all and unobstructed; that transportation upon them shall be open to competition and beyond the reach of combinations and pools. It is not a question with them whether there are or are not sufficient railroad facilities to transact the business of the country. They do not care whether the products of the country shall be transported by river or rail. They know that water-ways serve as a balance to the machinery of transportation and a check upon exorbitant rates.

Some of the grievances which the people complain of can be remedied by legislation. Congress has the constitutional power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. This power to regulate commerce among the States is restricted to commerce which concerns more States than one. Commerce undoubtedly includes the subject-matter of intercourse and of traffic; intercourse and traffic include the means and instruments by which they are carried on; instruments undoubtedly include steamboats and railroads. It therefore follows that Congress may prescribe rules for transportation (not confined to a single State) by water and by land. What limit will be placed by the courts upon this power to prescribe rules can not be foretold, but Congress certainly has ample power to correct the glaring faults now apparent in the management of transportation companies and remedy the admitted grievances which the people suffer, and it will undoubtedly at the present session enter upon a course of legislation for that purpose. But the duty of Congress does not end here. It claims the power of controlling the navigable rivers of the country, of preventing and authorizing obstructions to them, of determining what works for the improvement of navigation shall be attempted or made, and has entered upon the work of improving nearly all of our great harbors and rivers. In fact, there is no longer any serious question as to the constitutional power of Congress to improve the harbors and water-ways of the country. In considering the question as to whether any particular improvements shall be undertaken the questions as to whether it is necessary, whether it will be beneficial to commerce, and whether its relative importance compared to other improvements is sufficient to warrant its commencement, as well as whether the condition of the Treasury is such as to justify the expenditures, are involved.

There is no doubt but that the Columbia River will, in time, be improved by the General Government, so as to admit of unobstructed navigation for a thousand miles from its mouth, and there is no other portion of the country where so great a benefit to the inhabitants of so extensive a region can be obtained for so small an outlay. The only questions are, how shall the river be improved and when shall the improvement be commenced.

The Government has undertaken to remove the obstructions to navigation at the Cascades. The rapids are known as the Lower Cascades and the Upper Cascades. The project is to build a canal and locks around the Upper Cascades and to improve the Lower Cascades by blasting out rocks and removing obstructions so that the river at this point may be navigated, except during the very highest stage of water. There has been appropriated for the work $1,142,500. The amount required to complete the project is $1,062,500.

The work should be, and could be with sufficient appropriations, completed in two years' time, but at the rate at which money has been appropriated in the past for this improvement it will require from eight to ten years yet to complete it. The removal of the obstructions at The Dalles should have been undertaken at the same time as the improvement at the Cascades and prosecuted so as to be completed with the completion of that improvement. These two improvements are complements of each other. The two obstructions divide a stretch of over 500 miles of navigable river into two nearly equal parts, and the full benefit to be derived from each work will not be secured until the other is completed. Estimates have been made for the improvement of the river at The Dalles by the usual method of a canal, at an estimated cost, in round numbers, of $11,000,000. With the usual manner in which appropriations for such works are made generations will have passed away before the work could be completed. At the rate at which appropriations have been made for the canal and locks at the Cascades it would take one hundred years to open up the river to navigation at this point by that means.

It must be borne in mind also that no benefit can be derived from the expenditure upon this work until the entire work is completed, and that the full benefit of the great outlay by the Government at the Cascades will not be realized until the river is also opened at The Dalles portage. It is obvious that the commercial interests of the vast territory tributary to the Columbia demand, either by the adoption of some cheaper plan of improvement or the policy of larger appropriations for such works, a more speedy opening of the river at this point. The proposed improvement by a boat railway can be inaugurated and completed in a single year and at a cost of one-eighth of the estimated cost of a canal.

Mr. Symons, in his report, recommends boat railways for overcoming obstructions to navigation in the Columbia River above The Dalles rapids, and summarizes his recommendations as follows:

To summarize, then, the system of improvements that I would advocate to give continuous navigation from Grand Rapids to the mouth of the Columbia River is as follows:

First. The improvement required at the Spokane Rapids, the expense of which would be slight.

Second. A combined system of river improvement and boat railways at the Nespilem Rapids.

Third. A boat railway at Rock Island Rapids, and the improvement of the river at Cabinet Rapids.

Fourth. The construction of a boat railway around Priest Rapids.

Fifth and sixth. The construction of a canal with locks about The Dalles and the Cascades.

The following approximate estimate of the cost of the improvements above the mouth of Snake River is given:

Boat railway around Priest Rapids	$600,000
Boat railway around Rock Island Rapids	400,000
Boat railway around Foster Creek Rapids	400,000
Boat railway around Kalichen Falls, &c	800,000
Boat railway around Mahkin Rapids	500,000
	2,700,000
Improvement of the river at Priest Rapids	50,000
Improvement of the river at Cabinet Rapids	60,000
Improvement of the river at Rock Island Rapids	25,000
Improvement of the river at Nespilem Rapids	150,000
Improvement of the river at Spokane Rapids	20,000
Total	3,005,000

The estimated cost of the improvement at The Dalles portage of the Columbia according to the project submitted by Major Jones is $1,373,000.

The estimated cost of the completion of the canal and locks at the Cascades is $1,062,500—making a total for these two improvements and the work recommended by Lieutenant Symons of $5,440,500.

Thus it will be seen that the Columbia River, from its mouth to Grand Rapids, a distance of 750 miles, can be made navigable by the expenditure of a sum slightly in excess of $5,000,000; providing, of course, that boat railways are feasible.

The only question, it appears to me, worthy of consideration in determining whether the work shall be undertaken at once is its practicability. If the opinions of engineers can be relied upon that is assured. But if it be admitted that it would, to a certain extent, be an experiment, who has a greater interest in making the experiment and testing the practicability of boat railways than the Federal Government? If it should prove a success the Government would be able to substitute railways for canals at one-eighth of the cost of the latter, and the people would also be greatly benefited by securing, at a much earlier date, the unobstructed navigation of the water-ways of the country.

But the project of a boat railway is not a visionary one. One of the greatest engineers in this or any other country has projected a railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean on Mexican soil, by which it is proposed to take ships, with their cargoes weighing 7,000 tons, from one ocean and, transporting them with speed and safety, deposit them in the other, and has organized a company to construct it. The Government of Mexico has made large concessions to aid in the construction of the road, and I have lately seen it stated in the public press that the company had abandoned the effort to obtain Government aid from the United States, and expected to construct the road by private capital. I am satisfied of the practicability of that great work, compared to which a railroad for the transportation of boats, which can be navigated on the Upper Columbia, around The Dalles and Celilo Rapids, would be an insignificant affair.

In a pamphlet published in 1884, entitled "The Tehuantepec Ship-Railway; its Practicability and Commercial Features," the projectors of the ship-railway answered the objections which had been urged against the practicability of the scheme, and quoted from the opinions of engineers to show that the enterprise is entirely practicable. I read the following from the pamphlet referred to:

First objection: Injury to the vessel by the outward pressure of the cargo when she is taken out of the water.

Answer: When the vessel is in, what is called its "natural" element, she undergoes often unnatural and more severe strains than in docking. The sudden withdrawal of the water pressure when the vessel in a heavy sea rides, bow and stern, on two huge waves, would cause her sides to burst out if she were not specially constructed to withstand just such pressure. A heavy sea, rolling its great waves one after another alongside the vessel from bow to stern, with the hollow of the waves following quickly, would seem to be productive, if any possible condition could be, of the opening of the vessel's sides. The fact is, the bursting pressure is less than is imagined. Every elevator or grain-cargo box is more likely to be pressed outward or downward by its load of grain than is a vessel's sides when out of the water.

Second objection: Injury to the bottom of the vessel by supporting it by artificial means when the cargo is on board.

Answer: It should be clearly understood that the hydraulic press system which first holds up the vessel when she is out of the water is, as it were, so many columns of water under the vessel, gently and effectually equalizing her weight. If, in the process of raising, the support raised by one ram comes in contact with the keel, bottom, bilges, or sides of the vessel, it will exert no pressure until all the other rams have reached a point of contact, and then the pressure per square inch of ram surface is the same throughout the whole system. The rams of the greatest area are placed under the keel where the load is the greatest and the vessel most able to withstand heavy pressure. Over the whole surface of the hull, wherever it has any bearing upon the water, the full, complete, and adjustable system of supports is spread, with their broad and cushioned surfaces. Vessels of the most ancient and decayed skin and timbers, if seaworthy, can be carried on this perfectly equalized system of supports, and be in effect water-borne. In reference to both these objections, Mr. E. A. Fuertes, professor in the department of civil engineering of Cornell University, N. Y., gives very valuable testimony in reference to some examinations he made on the White Star line steamer Germanic, on the voyage between Liverpool and New York.

These examinations, made while the vessel was moving through an ordinary sea, were for the purpose of ascertaining the concave and convex flexures of the steamer in the direction of her length. He found that the total deflection in a distance of 264 feet was 13 inches, or 6½ inches above and below the mean line. Comparing the effects of a heavy sea upon an iron steamer with the effects upon the same steamer when carried upon a properly designed and constructed railway, he speaks of the strain upon the vessel when a sinking or receding sea instantly withdraws the volumes of water pressure from against her sides, and the reaction of her frame when, with equal suddenness, it feels the pressure of her cargo, if any such pressure exists.

"Also the sea strikes blows with concentrated vigor upon the restricted area of the ship's surface, causing the dreaded tremor from stem to stern, and working her joints and timbers with all kinds of flexures, tortions, and impacts. Only those who have had personal experience with the sea in a hurricane can realize the stiffness required in a sea-going vessel.

"It is strange to see how strongly intolerant popular misconceptions can be in questions of this kind. While a ship must be constructed so that it may stand safely on end or be shaken violently when held in the middle or by her extremities, the popular prejudice against a ship-railway is based upon the assumption that all ships are wanting in the very quality that they must possess, namely, stiffness."

The following statement of opinions and facts upon this subject will support the views advanced above. A letter, dated February 14, 1882, from Mr. William S. Buckley, president of the New York Balance Dock Company, gives a list of five ships and six steamers, ranging from about 2,000 to 2,700 tons, that were taken out on his dock with cargoes in them. In this letter Mr. Buckley says: "We do not refuse any class of ships or steamers, even with coals and cargoes on board, whose length does not exceed the length of the dock. In every case in which we have taken up steamers with the cargoes in, it has been done without the least strain or injury to the vessel. As the rule is to make a charge for raising the cargo on a vessel, they usually come to us without cargo."

Mr. Edward Hart, United States naval constructor, in a letter to Mr. Eads, says (quoting a portion only appertaining to this subject):

"With a substantial road-bed for your ship-railway, on the easy grades across Tehuantepec, which I understand do not exceed one or two feet in the hundred, there can be no mechanical difficulty in the way of transporting loaded ships by railroad with entire safety to the vessels, whether they be built of wood or iron." Mr. Hart is one of the oldest and ablest constructors in the United States Navy.

Mr. H. L. Fernald, a constructor of the United States Navy, of recognized ability and talent, stated in a letter as follows:

"Having carefully examined the plans and papers pertaining to the proposed ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, I do not hesitate to say that in my judgment there will be no difficulty whatever in transporting, in the manner you propose, any properly built vessel with absolute safety."

The London Iron, of October 3, 1884, in brief but comprehensive language, sets at rest any fears that may exist in the minds of timorous people in reference to the injury that vessels may sustain by being docked and handled with the cargo on board.

"The question of endangering the structural integrity of a ship loaded with cargo by taking her out of the water and placing her on intermediate supports, is one which has been frequently raised only to be summarily disposed of by those who give the matter a moment's thought. As, however, there is still a popular notion that a loaded vessel under such conditions is subject to injurious strains, it may be as well if we point out how utterly impossible this is by reason of the construction of the vessel itself. No greater fallacy than this was ever conceived, for there is no form of structure which is known to be subject to more unequal, irregular, and ever-varying strains than a ship at sea, and these very points are carefully provided against in her design and construction. A properly designed and constructed ship resembles a girder, and is so built that no matter how she may be tossed about on the waves, the strains, conflicting and almost puzzling as they are, are distributed equally through her framing and plating or planking. If there was any fear of her cargo bursting her sides, as some have held there is, it would have burst them on her first loading, as, although water is incompressible in confinement, it is exceedingly yielding when unconfined. Hence the risk of damage to vessels by straining during transport overland, may at once be set aside as puerile, especially in the face of the ingenious arrangement designed by Mr. Eads for equalizing their support. Moreover, the raising of ships with their cargoes, from a lower to a higher level, by means of hydraulic lifts, has been successfully accomplished for long past. The Victoria Docks, in London, and those at Malta and Bombay, have been operated for years without an accident. Again, it is a matter of common occurrence to keep loaded vessels for days, and even weeks, upon dry-docks for repairs, and then return them to water without the slightest strain or injury."

The most valuable expert testimony that has been given on this subject is by Sir Edward Reed, K. C. B., late chief constructor of the British navy. The testimony was given before the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate. The following quotations are from his testimony, and bear directly on this special subject:

"I have no hesitancy in saying that the marine ships of to-day are vastly stronger everywhere than they were half a century ago, and that they are now, as a rule, perfectly capable of being docked in dry-docks with their cargoes on board.

"I would like to say, first, that there is no fear whatever of a ship undergoing any strain in the process of lifting out of the water (as would be necessary in case of a ship-railway) that she is not liable to, at present, in ordinary docking.

"I would say, further, that I am quite sure that the processes of ordinary docking, as carried on in a vast number of private establishments, are very negligent and insufficient in comparison with those which would be adopted in case of the hydraulic lifts connected with the proposed ship-railway."

In reference to the hydraulic docks at Malta he gives a list of several vessels docked with their cargoes on board, and states: "I would call attention to the fact that although ship-owners were at first afraid of docking ships in that way with their cargoes on board, they have discovered by the experience of years that no sort of injury does result, for all the ships that are in the Indian trade now voluntarily employ these docks and go upon them with their cargoes on board for the purpose of getting their bottoms cleaned and coated on the voyage, instead of having to lie in a more expensive dock in London for the purpose."

Mr. William Pierce, sole proprietor of the John Elder & Co.'s works, Govan, Glasgow, and who built the Arizona, the Elbe, and the Alaska, and others of the finest steamers afloat, says in a letter: "I am of the opinion from what I know of the working of iron floating-docks that I have designed and built, that iron steamers of 4,000 to 5,000 tons displacement may be docked loaded without any injury whatever."

Commander T. D. Wilson, chief constructor of the United States Navy, states as follows: "I see no good reason why any vessel cannot be successfully raised and transported upon a properly constructed railway, with a grade as stated, if reasonable skill and care are used in the work, and I believe the strain she will be subjected to will be inferior to those which ocean steamers are constantly exposed to."

Objections of various kinds have been raised to the plan of lifting vessels out of the water, and transporting them, but it is useless to enter into any further argument in regard to it in the face of the numerous and well authenticated facts which go to show that vessels are, in all parts of the world, very frequently docked with their cargoes on board without the least injury to the vessel. The only injury that can possibly happen to them under these circumstances is by careless handling or by not taking precautions against the strains that might possibly be engendered in lifting the vessel. I it is once admitted that the vessel can be docked with the cargo on board, it must also be admitted that ships can be hauled on a properly designed and constructed railway carriage without injury.

The project of boat railways, to overcome obstructions upon the Columbia River, has been submitted as feasible by competent engineers. In his report of the examination of the Upper Columbia, before referred to, Lieutenant Symons, in speaking of the improvement of Priest's Rapids, and after discussing the question as to whether the rapids can be rendered sufficiently navigable by working upon the bedrock and bowlders in the river, blasting and clearing away a properly laid-out channel, says:

If, however, when the proper detailed surveys have been made and experiments conducted, it is found, as I believe it will be, that it is not practicable to improve the bed of the river sufficiently to give good navigation, then some other means must be adopted.

The best means to adopt for this purpose I conceive to be a railway over which boats can be transported from the foot of the rapids to the head.

I would advocate a railway in preference to a canal and locks, on the ground of expense. The cost of the construction of a railway and its adjuncts would probably be not more than from one-sixth to one-fourth of the cost of a canal about Priest Rapids, and its operating expenses would not be very much greater,

Again he says:

While it is very far from my intention to give a detailed plan for a railway for transporting river boats around the rapids of the Columbia River, yet I wish to give a very general outline of such a plan.

Just below the foot of the rapids an inclined track could run down into deep water. A carriage, or car, with its top shaped to receive the bottom of the boat, could be run down on this track into the deep water and the boat received in it.

A stationary engine could take the carriage and boat up the incline to a summit point sufficiently high to give a slight down grade to the deep water at the head of the rapids. At the summit the vertical direction could be changed, and a locomotive could take the carriage and boat down to the head of the rapids, and bring back the carriage. At Priest Rapids the course of the railway could be perfectly straight, obviating any necessity for a horizontal change of direction. The time which would be occupied in making the portage need not exceed two hours at the most, and by having several carriages the process of taking one boat up the incline could go on coincidently with the transportation of another to the head of the rapids, so that, with everything working well, it may be safely estimated that a boat could be taken over every hour with a single track. This would accommodate the river commerce for many years to come, and if it ever became necessary the facilities for transporting boats could be indefinitely increased by building a double track for the return of the carriage, and adding the necessary improvements to the plant.

The class of boats which it will be found most advantageous to run on the Upper Columbia will probably be found to be similar to those now run on the Snake River, and of which the Spokane, Annie Faxon, and Almota are types. The Annie Faxon, the largest of these, is 165 feet long, 37 feet beam, 5 feet depth of hold, and has a measured tonnage of 709 tons.

If we suppose a boat with her load having a displacement of 800 tons, which is probably the largest boat that would demand transportation, the carriage or car on which to transport her must weigh about 100 tons. This 900 tons is the weight to be transported and handled on the railroad. Once up the incline it can readily be handled by a good freight locomotive on a properly constructed track. This would be much more than would ordinarily be taken over, as most of the freight would be down river, and boats would be lightly laden going up stream.

In the annual report of Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, on river improvement in Oregon and Washington Territory, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, that officer discusses the project for the improvement of that portion of the Columbia known as The Dalles, and submits a project for a boat railway around The Dalles and Celilo Falls, which he says is put forward for agitation and discussion. He says:

I propose to flank The Dalles and Celilo Falls with railway inclines, over which laden boats and river craft may be hauled by means of stationary engines at the summits, and to blast open the contracted water ways at Ten and Three-mile rapids to a width of 300 feet, which will be sufficient to reduce the velocities to a navigable status.

The proposition is not novel. It is a common thing to haul boats out of the water upon inclined railways, and the fact of their being laden will not materially affect the operation. Furthermore, its application at this same place has been advocated by engineers for many years.

I will append that part of Major Jones's report referring to the matter, omitting the drawings, to my remarks.

The Columbia Water Way Convention, at a session held at Vancouver, Wash., commencing October 14, 1886, a representative body composed of delegates from the various boards of trade and chambers of commerce of the principal cities in the Columbia River Valley, unanimously adopted a memorial to Congress concerning the improvement of the Columbia River. Referring to the removal of the obstructions at The Dalles, the memorial reads as follows:

The obstructions at The Dalles may be overcome, according to the opinion of the ablest engineers and of practical men who are conversant with the eminently successful operations of a similar railway upon the Ohio and Baltimore Canal. An important point in the adoption of a ship railway at this point is peculiarly favorable on account of the low and safe banks of the Columbia at these points of obstructions. It is fully believed that these obstructions may be passed in the manner named at less cost than would be required to complete the work at the Cascades.

I do not advocate the adoption, without further examination, of the precise plan proposed by Major Jones, a plan which he does not claim as original and one which he admits may be improved. And it is quite possible that other and more economical and better plans will be submitted, if the project of overcoming these rapids by means of a boat railway shall be entered upon. I feel confident that the project is entirely feasible, that it is preferable to a canal and locks, both because of the comparatively small cost of the work and on account of the shorter time required for its completion. But even if it be admitted that a canal and locks would be the best means of overcoming these obstructions, would be operated with less danger and delay and with greater economy, and conceding that the Government is to eventually, if not in the near future, undertake such an improvement, in view of the fact that such a work with the customary Congressional appropriations for similar works could not be completed for many years, and that no benefit would be derived from the expenditure for the same until the work was fully completed, would not the temporary adoption of the cheaper plan of a boat railway, which could be constructed in a single year for a small per centage of the cost of the canal and locks, be wise and economical, even if abandoned when the more expensive work was completed?

There is another thing worthy of consideration. Congress appropriates from year to year large sums for the improvement of our navigable rivers by the removal of obstructions. The universal plan of improvement is by canals and locks. The first cost of such improvements is enormous, and the cost of repairs and operation is considerable. Here is a project put forth by competent engineers for accomplishing the same purposes at a small fraction of the first cost, and probably with not much greater cost for repairs and operation. The place proposed for trying the experiment of the cheaper plan is favorable, and it appears to me that the experiment is demanded upon business principles, with the view to testing the practicability of substituting boat railways for canals as a means of overcoming such obstructions.

Never was there in the history of this country a more auspicious time for the commencement of such a work and trying the experiment, if it shall be called such. The Treasury is full to overflowing, and the difficulty is not, therefore, how to obtain the money to carry on the operations of the Government and to improve our waterways, but how to get rid of our surplus revenues. The productions of the country are immense and increasing yearly, and by reason of the serious competition in the markets of the world of the products of India, Australia, and Russia, the problem of how to get our surplus products to market cheaply is the vital question of the hour, a question affecting every producer and consumer in the whole country, and one which is now being, and will continue to be, forced upon the consideration of Congress.

The Pacific coast never will demand or require large appropriations for the improvement of its rivers and harbors. Owing to the magnitude and the importance to commerce of the Columbia River, the immediate improvement of its mouth and the removal of obstructions at the points indicated are imperatively required, but the amount necessary for the purpose in comparison with the amount appropriated from year to year for river and harbor improvements is not large. There are other improvements being carried on, and which should be undertaken, of less magnitude and cost, but of great importance in both Oregon and California, the most important one at the present time in Oregon probably being the improvement of the Yaquina Bay. A harbor of refuge is imperatively required upon the coast between the Columbia River and San Francisco Bay. While the river and harbor bill of last session was under consideration in the Senate I took pains to make a calculation of the amount of appropriations contained in the bill as it came from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in all the States and Territories west of the Rocky Mountains, and to compare it with the amount appropriated for the other States and Territories. Three States and four Territories west of the Rocky Mountains have an aggregate area of 776,334 miles. The total area of all the States and Territories is 3,008,616 miles, 2,232,283 square miles of the entire area being east of the Rocky Mountains. I found that out of a total appropriation of about eighteen millions contained in the bill as it came from the committee, the total appropriation for the three States and four Territories west of the Rocky Mountains amounted to only $1,009,000.

Some criticisms have been made upon this floor upon the amount of appropriations heretofore made for rivers and harbors in Oregon and Washington. I have been characterized as the most persistent beggar for appropriations for my State on the Commerce Committee. But the truth is that, with the exception of a single improvement, compared with the magnitude and importance of the works and with the estimates of the engineers, the appropriations for improvements in Oregon and Washington have been smaller than for improvements for works of similar character in any other part of the Union. I submit a statement showing when each improvement now in progress in Oregon, Washington, and Idaho was commenced and the amounts and dates of the several appropriations for the same; also showing the total amounts of all appropriations for that State and the two Territories named, with the amounts appropriated by each river and harbor appropriation bill.

An appropriation of $150,000 for a harbor of refuge upon the Pacific coast was made several years ago, and a commission appointed to select the location selected Port Orford, upon the Oregon coast; but the Secretary of War declined to expend the money without further direction from Congress, and the appropriation is still unexpended with the exception of the amount required for the expenses of the commission.

I have no apologies to make for the earnestness and persistency with which I have pressed upon the attention of the Senate Committee on Commerce, and of the Senate, the importance of the improvement of the rivers and harbors in the Northwest, or for presenting the subject again even at the risk of wearying the Senate. This is the great and all-absorbing question with the people of that section. They are, it is true, greatly interested in the question of coast defenses; the cities of Portland and Astoria on the Columbia River, and the cities which line the shores of Puget Sound, are exposed to destruction or tribute in case of foreign war. The forts at the mouth of the Columbia are worthless for defense against modern war-ships armed with modern guns, and upon the Sound there are no defenses whatever. They are not indifferent to the questions of tariff and finance, but the all-absorbing topic, transcending in importance to the people of the Columbia Valley all questions of tariff, of finance, of coast defenses, and even questions of party politics, is the subject of an unobstructed river, for in that is involved the vital question of cheap transportation, and to them cheap transportation means assured and continued prosperity. In all that I have said I have but feebly, indeed, voiced their sentiment upon these questions. They are watching with jealous care the expenditure of the appropriations for public works. Their complaints of supposed irregularities upon the part of the Government agents have been voiced upon this floor. Whether their complaints are well founded or not, it is quite certain that, in the future at least, the money appropriated for the improvement of rivers and harbors in the Pacific Northwest will be expended to the best advantage.

When I introduced the resolution I hoped that the expense of a proper examination and survey could be paid out of some existing appropriations, and that such survey could be made and reported to the Senate at the present session in time to be considered before the final disposition of the river and harbor appropriation bill. I have since learned that there is no existing appropriation out of which a proper survey can be made, and that a special appropriation for the purpose is necessary.

The necessity for the improvement of the river at this point being beyond dispute, feeling fully assured of the entire practicability of the proposed boat railway, and believing that the work ought to be commenced without delay, my colleagues and myself will endeavor to secure, at the present session of Congress, an appropriation to commence the work at once, with a proviso, however, that the money shall not be expended until a survey has been made by a competent board and the plan of the work has been approved by the Secretary of War.

It has been well said that—

The National Government has wisely lent its aid among others to construct three great lines of railroad to the Pacific coast. * * * They will be * * * overburdened with the traffic that will grow with their growth and extend with their connections. But the great and magnificent rivers of the West are never overburdened; they are the nation's arteries, formed at the creation to relieve the ever-fructifying earth of her superfluous wealth of production, completed to aid civilized man in carrying forward the command of his Creator to subdue the earth. All they need from man is very little continuous care to free them from obstructions, and all expenditures made for this object repay more than fifty-fold.

One of these companies aided was the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. It received a grant of lands to aid in the construction of its road, including that portion of its main line down the Columbia River from Wallula Junction to Portland, a distance of 214 miles. Nothing has yet been done toward the construction of that portion of its road, and another railroad company, unaided by the Government, has constructed and had in operation for several years a railroad over the same general route. Since I have been a member of the Senate I have earnestly and persistently endeavored to secure the forfeiture by Congress of this portion of the Northern Pacific land grant, but so far without success. The value of the lands which would be restored to the public domain by such Congressional action is greater than the cost of improving the Columbia River, in accordance with the plans I advocate to-day, from its mouth to Grand Rapids, thus securing unobstructed river navigation for a distance of 750 miles. In the name of the people of Oregon, whom I have the honor in part to represent in this body, and of the people of the Territories of Washington and Idaho, whose interests I seek to serve, I earnestly plead for the recognition they deserve, and the relief they demand, by prompt and energetic measures, upon the part of the General Government, to secure the unobstructed navigation of the Columbia River.

I append to my remarks the recommendation of Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, for the improvement of The Dalles of the Columbia, contained in his report on river improvements in Oregon and Washington Territory for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885:

THE DALLES.

For a distance of about 13 miles, commencing a little above the city of The Dalles, Oregon, the Columbia River is obstructed in a gigantic manner that is perfectly unique in the history of river improvements. The whole water-way is choked, apparently by an intrusion of lava, through which the river has with difficulty cut a passage. At one point, over a distance of 8,000 feet, the passage is so narrow that the river is polarized, as it were, and set on edge The chasm has in places such widths as 125, 147, and 150 feet, and its average width is about 250 feet. Except at high-water stages, the whole volume of this great river, whose discharge varies between 77,000 cubic feet per second at low water, and 257,000 cubic feet per second at high water approximately, is forced through this narrow, precipitous gorge. In order that it shall get through, the waters are dammed up at the head until the slope becomes such as to produce an enormous velocity. Throughout the whole distance of 13 miles the water-way of the river is very much contracted; at two places, Ten-Mile Rapids and Three-Mile Rapids, the minimum widths at low water are 210 feet and 190 feet, respectively. The serious obstructions to navigation over the whole reach occur in order, commencing at Celilo at the head, at Celilo Falls, Ten-Mile Rapids, The Dalles, and Three-Mile Rapids. At Cecilo Falls there is a considerable fall at low water, which, however, becomes nearly obliterated at high water by the waters dammed back by The Dalles. At this point a portage of 4,500 feet will carry from good water above the falls to the same below.

Thence down to Ten-Mile Rapids the river is suitable for navigation. At this point the channel can be widened sufficiently by removing about 270,000 cubic yards of rock.

Thence to The Dalles the river again becomes suitable for navigation. At The Dalles the river might be widened to 300 feet by the removal of about 700,000 cubic yards of rock. The portage here is about 9,000 feet between good water above and below.

At Three-Mile Rapids the channel can be sufficiently widened by rock removal, and thence no further serious obstructions exist.

For a very thorough and accurate description see Captain Powell's report of survey, published in Senate Ex. Doc. 184, Forty-seventh Congress, first session. The following data, taken from this report, are quite interesting:

Distance from Celilo (gauge No. 1) to Dalles City (gauge No. 5).....miles...	13.6
Total fall in water surface:
At high water.....feet...	56.5
At low water.....do.....	81.0

It is interesting to note here the damming effect at high water of the Cascades, 45 miles below:

Distance between gauge 1 (Celilo) and gauge 2 (foot of Celilo Falls)...feet...	6,000.0
Total fall in water surface:

The magnitude of this great problem in engineering will appear when the oregoing is considered in the light of the fact that the great annual flood occurs with precision in June of each year, and the water-levels are constantly and rapidly changing.

PROJECT FOR IMPROVEMENT.

The obvious mode of improving navigation here is to dodge these mighty obstacles by means of canals and locks; but when one considers the extensive excavations in solid basalt rock, and walls and gates of unprecedented heights that will be required to accommodate the extraordinary variations in the level of the water, the element of uncertainty combines with that of extraordinary cost and length of time required for construction, and demands a pause. Estimates have been made and submitted for building a canal to flank Celilo Falls, with blasting operations for making the river good at Ten-Mile Rapids, The Dalles, and at Three-Mile Rapids. This project is estimated to cost in round numbers $11,000,000. If we apply to this enormous sum the rate at which funds have been provided for the Cascades Canal, it will appear that over one hundred years would be required before navigation could be opened through these obstructions. Now, there is but little doubt in my mind that ultimately the solution of this problem will be by means of these operations, but I am very strongly impressed with the conviction that the day of their construction ought to be postponed until a system of making appropriations has been adopted which will permit of their construction within a reasonable length of time, and when the resources of the country will justify the expenditure. In the mean time, if the plan I shall now propose should prove to be a sufficient solution, there will result a great saving to the public Treasury.

BOAT RAILWAY.

I propose to flank The Dalles and Celilo Falls with railway inclines, over which laden boats and river craft may be hauled by means of stationary engines at the summits, and to blast open the contracted water ways at Ten and Three-Mile Rapids to a width of 300 feet, which will be sufficient to reduce the velocities to a navigable status.

The proposition is not novel. It is a common thing to haul boats out of the water upon inclined railways, and the fact of their being laden will not materially affect the operation. Furthermore, its application at this same place has been advocated by engineers for many years. Lieut. T. W. Symons, Corps of Engineers, in 1881 recommended it, and makes estimates of cost in his published report upon the Columbia River. Furthermore, the development of steamboat construction for the swift waters of the Upper Columbia and Snake Rivers has resulted in a boat with no keel and a perfectly flat bottom, but with good lines at stem and stern. This very much simplifies the question of a car for carrying the boats, as will be seen from the designs submitted herewith. Plans for Celilo Falls only are submitted, and on these the estimates for both The Dalles and Celilo are based. The maximum grade of the track is 213.84 feet per mile. The summit is passed by a gentle curve, quite within the limits of longitudinal flexure that will result from passing over the summit curve. The car is made up of cross-girders supported by longitudinal built beams, which in turn are carried by the wheel axles, the whole suitably braced, and having sufficient iron introduced to prevent floating when completely submerged. It will be handled by cables from the stationary engine at the summit. It will have twenty-one wheels on each side, with independent axles, forty-two in all, running on a two-rail track 25 feet 6 inches wide. The maximum load on a single wheel will be about 17 tons. Length and width over all, 190 feet and 48 feet respectively. For the present only a single line of track is proposed. Should the traffic develop a necessity for it, another can be laid alongside. The following is a detailed estimate of cost, from which it appears that at an expense of a little more than one and a quarter million dollars navigation can be opened through this obstruction at all stages of the river except when it is closed by ice.

Power required to carry a boat over the Celilo Falls.

	Tons.
Total weight of car	170
Estimated weight of boat	100
Estimated weight of load	500

Or 1,724,800 pounds.

The weight has to be raised to the height of 80 feet, giving in foot-pounds 1,724,800 by 80=137,984,000 foot-pounds.

To develop 137,840,000 foot-pounds of energy requires an engine of the following power capacity, viz:

Time allowed for development of full power.	Time required for the load to go from one to the other end of road.	Capacity required from the engine doing the haul.	Approximate cost of engine and boiler.*
Minutes.	Minutes.	Horse-power.

40	80	105	4,000

*The prices here are for engines of the simplest model, complete, with boiler.

REMARK.—The price of boiler is very nearly equal to the price of engines; thus if one change of boiler be desired the total price would be about 50 per cent. more than prices in this list.

In conclusion, I beg to state that I put this project forward for agitation and discussion, refraining from recommendation until it has been discussed and treated in the usual way.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. I desire to supplement what my colleague has so well said in regard to this proposed improvement at The Dalles of the Columbia, by a simple statement at this time that on the 5th of January, a year ago, the Senate adopted a resolution offered by myself directing the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard to investigate the general subject of freight charges in the valley of the Columbia and to report to the Senate at as early a day as praticable the best means in the judgment of that committee of overcoming the obstructions to navigation at that point, The Dalles of the Columbia.

I will state that a subcommittee of the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard have been engaged for some time in investigating that matter, and are now about prepared to submit their report. I happen to be chairman of that subcommittee, and I desire to state that I hope to be able to present the report of the full committee to the Senate within a very short time.

I will state furthermore that so far as I am concerned individually, I have no kind of doubt that the proper means to be adopted for the purpose of overcoming the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles of the Columbia is by means of a boat railway, as suggested by my colleague, and when this report shall be submitted I shall take the opportunity of presenting some further remarks in regard to the matter. In the mean time I would ask my colleague to permit his resolution to lie on the table until the report comes in.

Mr. DOLPH. I will state to my colleague that it is the intention, for reasons explained in my remarks already, not to press the resolution, but to urge a different line of action in the matter.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon. The resolution offered by me in January, 1886, is as follows:

Whereas the Columbia River is, with the exception of obstructions at the Cascades, distant from its mouth 160 miles, for a distance of about 5 miles, and further obstructions at The Dalles, distant from its mouth 220 miles, for a still greater distance, navigable for large-draft steamers from the sea to a point inland distant 1,032 miles, with tributaries aggregating over 300 additional miles of navigable waters; and

Whereas a canal and locks are now under process of construction by the United States Government around such obstructions at the Cascades; and

Whereas said Columbia River and its navigable tributaries drain an extent of country unsurpassed in agricultural, grazing, and mineral productiveness, capable of producing from sixty to eighty millions of bushels of wheat annually, an area of country in geographical extent equal to one-twentieth of the entire area of the United States, as large as Germany or France, and over one-fourth of the area of South America; and

Whereas the commerce of that vast and fertile region is increasing with marvelous rapidity, the custom-house statistics showing that, in the year 1884, 403 vessels passed out of the mouth of the Columbia River for foreign and domestic ports with cargoes valued at $15,600,000, as against 63 vessels in the year 1880 with cargoes valued at $4,181,352, while the tonnage over the bar at the mouth of the Columbia for the year ending September 30, 1885, was 869,943 tons; and

Whereas it is alleged that freight charges on wheat from The Dalles to Portland, Oreg., a distance of 88 miles, are now 12 cents per bushel of 60 pounds, and from Wallula, Wash., to Portland, Oreg., a distance of 214 miles, 18 cents per bushel, and all other freight charges, it is alleged, are in equal enormous proportions; and

Whereas it is alleged such freight charges are exorbitant and ruinous to the producer, and as it is further alleged that the real remedy for this evil is in freeing the Columbia River and its navigable tributaries from obstructions to navigation, and that this work is essentially national in its character: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into these alleged grievances both as to their existence and the proper measures of relief, and also as to the importance of the speedy completion of the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia and the means proper to be adopted to overcome the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles of the Columbia, and to report by bill or otherwise at the earliest practicable period.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] will lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7192) to provide a school of instruction for cavalry and light artillery, and for the construction and completion of quarters, barracks, and stables at certain posts for the use of the Army of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4308) to regulate steam engineering in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 10051) for the erection of a public building at Charleston, S. C.;

A bill (H. R. 7596) to enable foreign executors and administrators to sue in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 8893) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to execute a deed of quit-claim and release on a certain alley in Washington to Cornelia P. Randolph and others.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 7988) granting an increase of pension to Bryant Waters, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PROTECTION OF PROPERTY FROM FIRE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The Chair will lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the bill (S. 1212) for the further protection of property from fire and safety of lives in the District of Columbia. The amendment of the House of Representatives will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 7, after the word "upwards" the House of Representatives inserted "used for any of the purposes hereinabove mentioned," so as to read:

That it shall be the duty of the owner or owners, in fee or for life, of every building constructed and used, or intended to be used, as a hotel, factory, manufactory, theater, tenement-house, seminary, college, academy, hospital, asylum, hall, or place of amusement, and of the trustee or trustees of every estate, association, society, college, academy, school, hospital, or asylum owning or using any building 50 feet high or upwards, used for any of the purposes hereinabove mentioned, to provide and cause to be erected and affixed to said building iron fire-escapes and combined stand-pipes and ladders, or either of said appliances as may be approved and adopted by the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill just announced by the Secretary passed the Senate on the report of the Committee on the District of Columbia. They have examined the amendment that has been made by the House and recommend a concurrence. I therefore move that the Senate concur in the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendment was concurred in.

INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1213) to regulate insurance in the District of Columbia, which was in section 2, line 4, after the word "December" to strike out "accompanied by a list of the names of the stockholders," so as to read:

That every insurance company doing business in said District must transmit to the commissioners of the District a statement of its condition and business for the year ending on the preceding 31st day of December, which statement shall be rendered on the 1st day of January following, or within sixty days thereafter, &c.

Mr. INGALLS. That bill is in the same condition. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to, and the amendment was concurred in.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. 4308) to regulate steam engineering in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. 4806) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River at the foot of Pennsylvania avenue, east;

A bill (H. R. 7596) to enable foreign executors and administrators to sue in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 8893) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to execute a deed of quit-claim and release on a certain alley in Washington to Cornelia B. Randolph and others; and

A bill (H. R. 9125) to create a school board for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill (H. R. 10051) for the erection of a public building at Charleston, S. C., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I call up the interstate-commerce conference report. I believe it comes before the Senate at this time, but if it is necessary to make a motion I move to take it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, in the chair). The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the bill (S. 1532).

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, after fifteen years of agitation, during which the public mind has been enlightened by the most exhaustive and far-reaching discussion, we have reached a point where a conference committee of the two Houses of Congress have agreed upon and reported as a substitute for the two bills submitted to them a bill regulating commerce "among the States"—interstate commerce. The question before the Senate is, shall the report of the committee be adopted and the bill passed? Is the bill constitutional? Are its provisions just to the people and to the railroad corporations? Is there a general public demand for a law regulating interstate commerce, and is such a law necessary? If these questions can be answered in the affirmative, as I believe they can, then it is unquestionably true that the conference report should be adopted.

I have heard no constitutional objection seriously urged to the bill save and except that in the argument of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], which he frankly acknowledged to be at war with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which decisions, I will add, commence with the great case of Ogden vs. Gibbons, in the time of Chief-Justice Marshall, and run in an unbroken line down to this hour, all affirming the sole and exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce, whether carried by land or water, to be in Congress. The breadth and comprehensiveness of the power may be seen from the following, which I read from Chief-Justice Marshall's opinion in Gibbons vs. Ogden:

"Commerce in its amplest signification means an exchange of goods, but, in the advancement of society, labor, transportation, intelligence, and various mediums of exchange become commodities and enter into commerce. The subject, the vehicle, the agent, and their various operations become the objects of commercial regulation. Ship-building, the carrying-trade, and propagation of seamen are such vital agents of commercial prosperity that the nation which could not legislate over these subjects would not possess the power to regulate commerce."

Every decision of the Supreme Court since Ogden vs. Gibbon has been in line with the opinion in that great case, so that the doctrine announced in it is to-day as firmly established and as unquestioned as any other in the Constitution or administration of our Government. No single case in the whole range of our jurisprudence can be found which impugns it. It makes no difference how the commerce is carried, whether on land or water, in ships or boats, or in cars, the doctrine is held to be equally applicable. The argument of the Senator from Alabama is an arraignment of this whole course of decision; and if he could convince the Senate that no constitutional power exists in Congress to enact such legislation as is provided for in the pending bill; that it is an infringement of the rights of the States, the Supreme Court of the United States, continuing as, of course, it will, to hold all State legislation which attempts to regulate interstate commerce absolutely null and void, the question would be left, where it now is, in the hands of irresponsible and unrestrained railroad corporations, with power to tax the products of industry of this country at will.

In the inception of the agitation on this subject a denial of the constitutional power of Congress to legislate in the mode now proposed was a favorite argument of those who opposed any legislation on the subject; but in later years, under the light of investigation and discussion, and especially of the later decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which have amplified and extended the scope of the doctrines laid down in Gibbons vs. Ogden to embrace the widened and widening circle of commercial activity and development of this great era, this argument has been so far abandoned as to be rarely heard, and when suggested at all is not pressed or seriously relied on.

The objections almost exclusively relied on against the bill go to its wisdom and expediency and its alleged injustice to the railroad corporations. I do not propose to go into the details of the bill nor to do more than state very briefly my reasons, without elaboration, for the vote I shall cast in favor of it, but undertake to affirm confidently that the intelligent judgment of the country will approve it, not because it is all the people have a right to demand, or because it gives them justice, but because while falling greatly below the standard in both of these regards it is a beginning, it is a good long step in the right direction, which may be added to and supplemented in the future, and by the light of experience perfected so as to be absolutely just and effective.

A brief glance at the leading points of the bill as reported from the conference committee will, I think, justify this assertion. They are:

First. That all charges shall be reasonable and just.

Second. That there shall be no discrimination between persons or firms, either directly or indirectly, by special rates, rebate, drawback, or any other device, but that all shall be treated equally and alike for like and contemporaneous service.

Third. That no undue or unreasonable preference or advantage shall be given to any particular person, firm, company, corporation or locality.

Fourth. That no greater compensation shall be charged for the short than for the long haul, where both are made under substantially similar conditions and circumstances over the same line and in the same direction, provided that in special cases, upon application to the commissioners, they may upon investigation relax the rule; and provided further, that nothing contained in the bill shall be construed to authorize the charge of as much for the short as the long haul.

Fifth. It declares unlawful any combination, contract, or agreement between railroad corporations for the pooling of freights of different and competing roads, or to divide between them the earnings of such roads, provides penalties, and declares each day of the violation of the law a separate offense.

Sixth. It requires all schedules of rates plainly printed, and posted at all depots and stations for public inspection. It forbids any advance in rates as published except upon ten days' notice duly published. Reduction of rates may be made without notice.

These are the leading, salient points of the bill, the remainder of it being mainly administrative in its character and devoted to the methods of enforcing the provisions named.

Now, Mr. President, I assert, without the fear of successful contradiction, that these provisions are in substantial if not literal accord with the common law governing common carriers as known and practiced in the States of the Union so far as the rights of the public and the duties and obligations of the carriers are concerned.

The penalties for violation of the law and the means of enforcing it involve some departure from common-law methods, but this is rendered necessary by the inadequacy of ordinary remedies in the hands of a citizen for the enforcement of the law or the vindication of his rights against powerful railroad corporations. It is this consideration which justifies the appointment of a commission and devolves upon it the important part it is to perform in securing an enforcement of the law.

This bill, except as to remedies, is in substance and legal effect, so far as they are applicable to conditions here, a substantial epitome of the English statutes, which confessedly are only a codification of the English common law of common carriers, the source of our common law on the same subject. There is but one substantial exception to this proposition, and that is as to combinations and agreements between railroad corporations, which, in some cases, are permitted under the English law, but forbidden under this bill. As this fact has been adverted to in the debate in justification of the pooling system here, I will read from an able argument of Mr. Simon Sterne, of the New York bar, made before the House Committee on Commerce, extracts from the English statutes and some of his observations thereon, which show how this phase of the subject has been met in England, from which it will be seen that no argument in favor of the American system of pooling can be drawn from that in England.

I read from page 121 of arguments and statements before the House Committee on Commerce. Mr. Sterne quotes at length section 90 of the English "Railway Clauses Act," which reads as follows:

Whereas it is expedient that the company should be enabled to vary the tolls upon the railway so as to accommodate them to the circumstances of the traffic, and that such power of varying shall not be used for the purpose of prejudicing or favoring particular parties, or for the purpose of collusively and unfairly creating a monopoly, either in the hands of the company or of particular parties, it shall therefore be lawful for the company, subject to the provisions and limitations herein, and in the special act contained, from time to time to alter or vary the tolls by the special act authorized to be taken, either upon the whole or any particular portion of the railway, as they shall think fit: Provided, That all such tolls be at all times charged equally to all persons and after the same rate, whether per ton per mile or otherwise, in respect of all passengers and of all goods, or carriages of the same description, conveyed or propelled by like carriages or engines passing only over the same portion of the line of railway under the same circumstances. And no reduction or advance in any such tolls shall be made either directly or indirectly in favor of or against any particular company or persons traveling upon or using the railway.

Then he proceeds:

The "railway clauses act" of 1863 made all agreements between railway companies, either in the way of working arrangements or for purposes of consolidation, lease, or of any other device by which railways had down to that period extended their powers, subject not only to the sanction of their shareholders, but subjected such agreements also to the supervision of the board of trade, in its twenty-fifth clause, in these words:

"The agreement shall not have any operation until it is approved by the board of trade, and the board of trade shall not approve the agreement without being satisfied of its having received the sanction of meetings of the respective companies, as aforesaid."

And here allow me to observe parenthetically that the board of trade of England is a branch of its executive government, the president of which is a member of the cabinet, and not a voluntary organization.

Even after the consent of the board of trade is obtained it is provided by the twenty-seventh section of this act that at the expiration of the first or any subsequent period of ten years after the making of the agreement, the board of trade may, if they are of the opinion that the interests of the state are prejudicially affected thereby, cause the same to be revised, and the board of trade may require the companies who are parties thereto to publish such notice of any intended revision of the agreement as the board of trade might direct, and the board of trade may modify the agreement in such manner as may seem expedient for the protection of the interests of the public, and may declare the modification to be part of the agreement, and the same shall be read and take effect accordingly.

All the powers under these acts to be exercised by the board of trade were by the subsequent act of 1873 transferred to the railway commissioners appointed under that act.

Speaking of the English railway commission, on page 124, Mr. Sterne says:

Now, it is proper to observe right here that this commission is not at all what an American railway commission has down to this period of time been.

The railway commissioners appointed by the various States are, with scarcely an exception, a mere perpetual committee of investigation to advise the Legislature as to the infringement of laws by the railway corporations and to recommend remedies. They have no judicial powers. On the other hand, this English railway commission is in every sense a court of justice. The difference between it and the ordinary courts of Westminster Hall is not one of power, but of limited jurisdiction; it does swift and prompt justice, and appeals from this body are within the jurisdiction of the commission itself. The act creating this court is known as the "regulation of railways act" of 1873 (36 and 37 Victoria, ch. 448). It creates a court of three judges, one of whom is a railway expert, the second a lawyer, and the third a statesman. The terms of the act creating this commission are, first, a transfer to this body of all the powers which have been given to the board of trade and to the court of common pleas, of supervision of contracts and enforcement of liabilities and duties; a general investiture of jurisdiction under the "railway and canal traffic act" of 1854, to investigate and redress all cases of undue or unreasonable preference or advantage in favor of or against any particular person or company, or of any particular description of traffic, or by which any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever is created; the enforcement of through rates; the enforcement of all requirements with reference to the publication of rates; the railway commissioners are clothed with the power to require the companies to distinguish in such books how much of the rate is for the conveyance of the traffic and how much for terminal charges, instead of imposing that duty upon the private freighter.

The commissioners likewise have power to hear and determine any question or dispute which may arise with respect to the terminal charges of any railway company, where such charges were not fixed by any act of Parliament, and to decide what is a reasonable sum to be paid to any company for loading, unloading, covering, collection, and delivering, and other services of a like nature, and making the decision of the commissioners under this section binding in all courts and in all legal proceedings whatsoever (sec. 15). All agreements between railway companies and canal companies, or between railway companies themselves, are made subject to the revisory powers of the commission. A month's publication of any proposed agreement between railway companies is required, so that it shall be deposited for public inspection at the office of the commissioners. Elaborate provision is also made for publication in the London, Edinburgh, and Dublin Gazettes. The act gave to the commission full power of inspection of the railways themselves, and of all their books, papers, and documents. It authorized the court to punish for contempt in like manner as if they were a court of record. It gave to the decisions and orders of this court the same legal effect as were given to decisions and orders of courts of record. It limited appeals to such cases only which, in the opinion of the commissioners themselves, involve a question of law. The operation of any decision or order made by the commissioners was not to be stayed pending the decision of any such appeal, unless the commissioners so ordered; and excepting in such cases as the commissioners themselves saw fit to certify as cases of law to a higher court, the order of the commissioners was to be deemed final.

The proviso to section 90 of the English "railway clauses act," which I have just read, and which is a clear and comprehensive statement of the English and American common law on the subject, embraces absolutely all the features of the pending bill which I have enumerated as the leading points in it, save and except the clause which prohibits combinations between corporations, but does prohibit these when made "for the purpose of collusively and unfairly creating a monopoly either in the hands of the company or of particular parties."

English railway corporations were not permitted to combine, or as we would term it, to "pool," except upon the approval and under the supervision of the English Board of Trade, which is a branch of the executive Government of England, the president of the board being a member of the English cabinet. This high governmental authority represented the English public in scanning the purposes, terms, rates, objects, &c., in giving or withholding its approval of a proposed combination. After its approval had been given, if it proved detrimental to the public interests, it could require a revision, and such changes and modifications as were thought necessary for the protection of these interests. In 1873, the powers exercised by the board of trade over this subject were, by act of Parliament, transferred to a board of railway commissioners, where it now resides.

That board can refuse to permit pooling between railroad corporations, or it can permit it upon such terms and conditions as it sees fit in the interest of the English public to impose. In addition, the English railway commission court, always in session with plenary power over the whole subject, is ready at all times promptly and on the spot to hear the complaint of the humblest subject and redress such grievances as he may have against any railroad corporation, and for this purpose is armed with all the ordinary and extraordinary powers with which courts are usually equipped. It may use the process of injunction, mandamus, and execution, and all other remedial process; and it may proceed by fine and imprisonment—in short, may do all on this subject that any other court may do in the exercise of a general jurisdiction.

Thus are the rights of English subjects guarded and protected and the iron hand of the law placed upon the power of great corporations. English law does allow railroad combinations made, but under its own eye, its own supervision, its own dictation, its own regulation, and its own control. This system grew from a small beginning, and has been perfected as time and experience has suggested, as ours will be if we will only commence it by the passage of this bill. The English Government represents the public and stands between the people and corporate rapacity, as the American people have heretofore demanded, and do now demand, that our Government shall do, instead of leaving them, as they are now, absolutely defenceless and without appeal, the prey of the unbridled power of railroad pools and combinations, which destroy all competition while they are unregulated and unrestrained.

What our system of railway regulation may, if commenced now, grow into in the future, whether into one analogous to the English system or to some other, it is useless now to speculate upon. It is sufficient now to know that the best judgment of those who have been intrusted with its consideration is embodied in the pending bill, and that to leave the question as it now stands without legislation is a greater wrong to the people of this country than could possibly follow the adoption of the bill. The bill is strictly in line with the principles of the common law; that system of laws which, as the Senator from Alabama happily expressed it, "fills this country like the air," being an embodiment of the culled and selected wisdom of centuries, as it has been evolved from the experience of mankind in the affairs of practical life, and which has been aptly eulogized as "the perfection of human wisdom."

I am not apprehensive of error or mistake, nor do I fear that we may wrong either the people or the corporations while adhering with fidelity to the tried and approved principles of the common law, as is done in the pending bill. The supreme court of New York in Hooker vs. Vanderwater (4 Denio, 349), where a number of canal boatmen agreed to put their boats into a pool and divide the earnings according to the number of boats, and not according to the service rendered, held the contract unlawful in an opinion from which I read, as follows:

It is nothing less than the attainment of an exemption of the standard of freights, and the facilities and the accommodations to be rendered to the public, from the wholesome influence of rivalry and competition. To produce that end more completely, each member binds himself not only to run all his present boats according to the agreement and turn their earnings into the common stock, at the rate agreed upon, and at which rate he is to be charged in the final distribution, though he may have received or charged less, but he is also prohibited, under severe penalties, from employing on any other terms boats subsequently acquired. Being thus secure against internal defection and external encroachments, and the members having thrown their concerns into stock, to derive an income in proportion to the number of shares they hold, and not according to their merited activity in business, and safe against the reduction of compensation that would otherwise follow mean accommodations and want of skill and attention, the public must necessarily suffer grievous loss. Indeed the consequences of such a state of things would be that freighters and passengers would be ill-served just in proportion that carriers were well paid.

The pool was pronounced unlawful.

This opinion declares the law as it is now, and has always been throughout the United States, on poolings and combinations for the purpose of destroying competition by common carriers, and stands unchallenged to-day and is adverted to simply as a sample and specimen of judicial decision on this subject. The decisions of our courts, the books of our standard law writers, and the constitutions and statutes of nearly all the States of the Union declare that the railroads are public highways, that they are common carriers, that they shall not discriminate in freights and charges, that they shall not allow rebates or drawbacks, that there shall be no pooling or consolidation between parallel or competing lines, and that more shall not be charged for the short than for the long haul of freights.

Twenty-three States of the Union have legislated for the regulation of State commerce, that is, of commerce commencing and ending in the State, but under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States their legislation whenever it touches commerce which commences in one State or Territory and ends in another, this being interstate commerce, is absolutely null and void, because the regulation of interstate commerce belongs exclusively to the jurisdiction of Congress. The States are not allowed to regulate interstate commerce, and if Congress shall refuse to do so, in what predicament is the country left? For the purpose of illustrating it, I now read from the statement of Mr. L. E. Chittenden before the House Committee on Commerce on the New York railroad pool. Says Mr. Chittenden:

One word further and I have done. This pool commenced in 1877; it was then a pool contract between the four trunk lines centering in New York. It has grown and stretched out its arms and increased, just as an English judge said such contracts would grow and increase, until now it embraces certainly more than forty—that was the last enumeration I had—of the principal railroads of this country. There is in New York city an equipped and organized pool government. It has its executive committee of the trunk lines; its executive committee of the pool, and another executive committee composed of one member from each pooling railroad; it has its board of arbitration, which is intended to take the place of the judiciary; it has its corps of, I do not know how many hundred clerks, an enormous concern, and over it all is the emperor, the commissioner, Mr. Fink, who to-day exercises a power for good or evil over the commerce and products of this country greater not only than that of any of his contemporaries, but greater than any man ever before exerted in the United States of America. He and his imperial organization are as independent of the law as it is possible for man or State to be, and the whole charter or contract which binds these forty roads into this one copartnership and confederation, judged by the principles of the common law, is as unlawful and as much against public policy, if we are to accept the declarations of the judges of the common law, as the Louisiana State lottery or any other similar institution which is confessedly without the pale of the common law.

He was asked the question:

Then why are not the courts open for redress?

Mr. Chittenden says:

They are, but what is the position of a man who undertakes to get redress in these courts? No merchant dares to do it. He can be crushed in his business if he does. The question to-day before this great dry goods trade is, whether or not it is wise, whether they can afford to go into the legal fight and attempt to get these pooling contracts set aside by the courts. No. There is hardly a week passes in the office of any prominent lawyer in New York that this matter is not presented. A merchant comes into the office of his counsel with a claim against a railroad for an overcharge or a denial of some legal right; the lawyer examines it and decides that there is no doubt about the merchant's right to redress. But when it comes to bringing a suit the merchant hesitates—he can not afford to do it. He can not take the risk of doing it, because the railroads have it in their power, at any time, to destroy the business of any man or firm that seeks redress in the courts.

The pool of the poor canal boatmen was broken up by an enforcement of the law. The great railroad pool successfully defies both law and public opinion, is absolute in its power over the commerce of the country, after it has destroyed all competition, and can tax it at pleasure, leaving the public absolutely without appeal and without redress.

I have before me the Drovers' Journal, published in Chicago, in December last, from which I read:

On the 1st of last March the east-bound pool increased the freight on live stock 40 per cent. and on dressed beef 50 per cent. from Chicago to the seaboard; and by this one act alone they have taken from the pockets of the producers of live stock not thousands but millions of dollars, which has been divided between the six trunk-lines comprising the east-bound pool.

The Chicago Tribune, which I have before me, says of this transaction that the increased rates are a dollar and a quarter a head for all stock transported East "more than the railroad officials thought it necessary to exact through the cold weather of last winter."

The Standard Oil enormity, through which one company is by discrimination and undue preference permitted to monopolize the entire oil trade of this country, bankrupting and destroying all who dare to attempt competition, is familiar to all.

It was proved before the House Committee on Commerce by the confession of leading railroad men that the charges upon the transportation of dry goods from the city of New York are 100 per cent. greater than they should be on a proper classification. I will not trouble the Senate to listen to recitals of the practices of railroad corporations under the pooling system, because hours could be consumed in that way and a tithe would not be told. I have named these as specimens of hundreds which are occurring every day. The pooling combination among the roads leaves no competition and the power of the pool becomes absolute.

It can and does discriminate between persons and firms, building up some and destroying others. It builds up some cities and towns, and destroys others. It terrorizes merchants and shippers and traders, who submit quietly to being plundered, because it is in the power of the pool to destroy their business, by advancing their freights and by giving reduced rates to their competitors. They dare not seek redress against the roads over which their freighting is done and with which they deal every day, and upon which they are dependent for the successful prosecution of their business, for there are a thousand ways in which they may be harassed and injured. Under the pooling system there is no uniformity, no stability in rates, so necessary for all legitimate business. The system of rebates and drawbacks, which are secret concessions to favored and preferred shippers, undermines confidence in commercial communities, for no man can tell when his competitors may be thus enabled to undersell him, and subject him to loss in his business.

Without reason, except that the corporations desire more money, and generally when such action cannot be anticipated, rates are advanced, as in the case I have just stated from the Chicago papers. There is but one limit to the power of pooled roads to tax the products of industry in this country; and that limit is found when, to tax higher, will stop production and transportation—how much will a given product bear in the way of tax for transportation and leave a pittance for the producer so as to keep him at work producing? There is no limitation, as things now stand, upon the power of pooled roads to tax the commerce of this country except such as is found in that proposition. There is no redress, no appeal, no remedy, unless Congress acts positively, affirmatively, and energetically.

The railroads are pooled throughout the country North, South, East, and West. There are great pools like that of the more than forty trunk-lines with headquarters in New York, and there are smaller pools like that in Texas, in which I am reliably informed the Houston and Texas Central Railroad and the Texas Pacific road, both in the hands of receivers appointed by the Federal court, officers of the court, administering and running the roads presumably under the direction of the court, in defiance and contempt of the constitution and laws of Texas, which forbid such combinations, are parties. These pools are operative only where there are competing roads. Their object is to break down and destroy competition. Wherever only one road is found, there is no competition. Then that one road is supreme and may fix its own rates to suit itself. That territory belongs to that road, and is out of the jurisdiction of the pool.

In this connection I will observe that I am informed in a note from the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics that there were on the 1st day of January, 1887, 33,694 railroad stations in the United States, of which 2,778 are junction points, that is, are points where there is more than one railroad, leaving 30,916 stations where there is but one railroad. These figures will give some idea of the relative proportion of competing and non-competing points.

The pool takes care of itself and combines to destroy competition and keep up rates wherever there is competition, but when there is none it leaves the single road to make its rates as high as it pleases. They are all for the corporations and nothing for the people. Mr. Albert Fink, the head and chief, or president, of the great New York pool, who is generally admitted to be the ablest man in America in railroad affairs, in one of his arguments before the House Committee on Commerce admitted the illegality of pooling, in this language: "The first step to this end (speaking of pooling) should be to legalize the management of railroad property under this plan, and to abandon the antiquated notion that a government or combination, as it is called, of this kind is against public policy."

Of course pooling would not need to be legalized, if it were not now unlawful. Mr. Fink, who is a man of great ability himself, has besides in his employ as head of the great pool over which he presides the finest legal talent in the United States, and always speaks advisedly. Yet there is no clause of the pending bill so bitterly assailed by the railroad people as that which prohibits pooling, admitted by the greatest man among them to be simply declaratory of the common law as it now exists. But the means of enforcing the law, of putting an end to the bold, open defiance of it practiced every day by railroad corporations are provided in the bill. That arouses their most strenuous opposition. The law as it stands now is a dead letter as against the powerful corporations who violate it, though vital and forceful against weaker trespassers like the canal boatmen, and they object to an invocation of the power of the Government for its execution and enforcement upon all alike, the strong and powerful as well as the poor and weak.

These people are contending for a vast stake. No greater ever hung upon the chances of human effort. Learned experts estimate the annual commerce of this country at three thousand millions of dollars' worth, three-fourths of which is carried by rail; and three-fourths of that carried by rail is interstate commerce, over which Congress alone has regulating jurisdiction. The Constitution of the United States vests the exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce in Congress. That power is being exercised by railroad pools and combinations, without responsibility to anybody, without restraint from any quarter.

They are fighting with all the appliances and equipments of power, of organized concentrated power, supported by all the aids and influences that can be commanded by unlimited wealth, by all the resources that money can buy, to retain in their hands for their own enrichment, because it includes the power to tax the people of this whole country at their will and pleasure, this power to regulate interstate commerce which the fathers of the Republic denied to the States and intrusted solely to Congress. They are seeking to defeat this bill, as they have defeated all such bills heretofore, because that result will leave them unmolested to handle as they please, and levy such tolls as their avarice may prompt upon twenty billions of dollars' worth of commerce annually.

While this bill is being fought on every clause and section in it, the chief assaults are made upon section 5, which prohibits pooling, and upon what is known as the "long and short haul" clause in section 4. The rule established by this section is that more shall not be charged for the short haul than is charged for the long haul, but a discretion is vested in the commissioners in special cases to relax this rule and allow more to be charged for the short than for the long haul. I confess that I would greatly have preferred the rule established by the section made absolute, and the discretionary proviso left out. This section recognizes that the short haul is attended relatively with greater expense than the longer haul by reason of unloading, detention of cars, &c., in that it does not forbid as great a charge for the short as for the long haul.

It does not seem possible with the discretion vested in the commissioners to reverse the rule established by section 4, when upon investigation in special cases it may be right to do so, that it can work any hardship on anybody. The objections to this section amount to this when reduced to their simplest form, that when the roads find it to their interest to make the long haul for less than a reasonable compensation they should be permitted to recover the deficiency by a higher charge on the short haul. This is the method of discriminating between localities, tearing down some towns and cities and building up others by unjust and unreasonable discriminations. This is forbidden in section 4, as in another section discrimination between persons and firms is forbidden. Railroads are public highways, and railroad corporations are common carriers.

"Common carriers" (says the court in Munn vs. Illinois) "exercise a sort of public office, and have duties to perform in which the public is interested; their business is therefore affected with a public interest." Their charges are required everywhere to be reasonable, and to be so must be based on the cost of the service rendered. Their duty to the public in virtue of their "office" demands equality in the treatment of all of whatever locality, subject only to the difference in the cost of the service rendered. It is impossible that the cost of making the short haul, under similar conditions and circumstances, with the like kind of property, in the same direction on the same line, the shorter being included within the longer distance, as prescribed by section 4, shall be greater than that of making the longer haul, and this bill simply recognizes this fact, and provides that greater compensation shall not be charged for the short than the long haul.

The power and the practice of discriminating between persons and firms and between localities, while essentially unjust, is more dangerous than any other and more offensive to a proper public policy. It is exercised in favor of a few great centers and a few individuals, concentrating the wealth of the country in a few hands and a few localities, while the tolls levied on the great mass of the producing people of the country are trebled and sometimes quadrupled by way of recouping alleged losses in making these discriminations. Western and Southern products carried East from these great centers, where they have gone into the hands of great speculators, derive the benefits of reduced rates, but while in the hands of the producers whose toil and labor created them, who are to be found near the country and wayside stations where there is no competition, are trebly and quadruply taxed for the purpose of recovering the alleged loss.

It is through these discriminations between persons and localities that a few firms obtain a control amounting almost to monopoly over the grain trade, the live-stock and dressed-meat trade, the oil trade, and other lines of trade, with power to depress prices while the products are in the hands of the producers, and after they are bought up to send up prices.

The producers are first robbed by the low prices, and the consumers afterward by high prices, the great manipulators, nearly always secretly in partnership with leading men of the railroad management, reaping vast and inordinate gains. This power to discriminate, to excite the hopes of men and communities on one side and their fears on the other, backed by unlimited amounts of money which they wring at pleasure from the people, with the best legal and other talent of the country at their command, is a standing menace to free government, and should not be tolerated for one moment among a free people.

Free from all restraints of law, responsible to nobody as they are now, and are seeking to continue, by the most desperate efforts to defeat this bill, the domination of corporate power must be broken now, or its admitted mastery in many States of this Union now will extend over the whole country. It can not be otherwise if the power remains with them, as it exists now, at pleasure to build up and pull down the prosperity of communities and individuals, pouring wealth into the laps of some and visiting others with bankruptcy and ruin. The direct tendency of this bill, and especially of the long and short haul clause, will be to decentralize the wealth of the country by taking away the opportunities for illegitimate speculation and diffusing the benefits of railroad transportation more equally among all the people of all sections of the country instead of concentrating them as is now done in a few localities at the expense and to the sacrifice of all others.

Railroads are, in their nature, essentially monopolistic under the freest possible system of competition. Competition such as obtains between merchants, mechanics, traders, and others, which regulates prices, is not possible in its fullest sense among railroads. They exclude all other methods of carrying. The vast amounts of capital required to build and maintain them, and the large areas of territory necessary to support them, and over which they are supreme in all matters of transportation and commerce, exclude the numbers which in other cases are necessary to promote active competition; while their terrorizing influence over those whose business is within their power—their power to punish enemies and reward friends—creates such a monopoly as should not be permitted to exist except under the regulating control and active, vigilant supervision of the Government for the protection of the rights of the citizen.

The States are powerless. Congress alone can respond to the great popular demand for relief. The repeated passage through the House of the well-known Reagan bill, a much more radical measure than that now before the Senate, establishes beyond doubt or cavil the will and demand of the American people who support and maintain this Government, and in whose interest it is supposed to be administered, that a law regulating interstate commerce shall be enacted. The Senate has heretofore defeated this plainly expressed popular demand. It remains to be seen if corporate power is so intrenched in this body that the pending bill is to share the fate of its predecessors.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I wish to state very briefly some of the conclusions which I have reached from such investigation as I have been able to give this question.

Next to production, the carrying trade is the most important factor in the business of the country.

In addition to the water-ways, we have, at this time, over 130,000 miles of railways engaged in this trade, and year by year the mileage is increasing, a very large percentage of the capital of the country being invested in them.

Remote from water-ways, railroads have monopolized the carrying trade, and have regulated, in their own way, and generally with an eye to their own interest, the freight rates throughout the country.

Transportation being an element which enters into the cost of most of the necessaries and luxuries of life, every citizen is interested in the question.

Every man who produces a surplus of any commodity is interested in cheap transportation to the best market; and every consumer is interested in cheap transportation, because it diminishes the cost of the article consumed.

Every merchant and trader is interested in uniformity and stability of rates, whether they be high or low; while the carrier is interested in the highest rates he can obtain, because the higher the rate the greater are his profits.

These facts present a sharp and direct conflict of interest, between the carrier on the one hand and the producer and consumer on the other.

For more than ten years the country has complained of what is alleged to be the unjust and unreasonable exactions of carriers, especially upon shipments made from and to non-competitive points; and not less loud and emphatic, or with less cause, have been heard the complaints of unjust and unreasonable discriminations between persons and places, by a system of rebates, drawbacks, private contracts, and the various devices which ingenuity could invent.

In view of these complaints, for which, unfortunately, there has been but too much cause, the country has for more than ten years demanded, and with great unanimity it still demands that the carrying trade be fairly and justly regulated by the Government. The power to regulate that which is interstate by Congress, and that which is State by its Legislature, has been too long and too well settled to admit of debate. The question is, shall Congress exercise the power?

The overwhelming majorities by which the Senate and House passed their respective systems of regulation gives an emphatic affirmative answer to this question, if the two Houses can agree upon the same system of regulation.

The conferees of the two Houses have agreed upon the bill now before the Senate, and I think the conference committee may congratulate itself upon the fact that in dealing with a question so vast, so important, and so complicated as this, the shafts of criticism have been leveled at but two of the provisions of the bill. What is known as the short-haul provision, which is section 4, and the prohibition of pooling contracts (section 5); but the short-haul provision has been the subject of severest criticism, and the most alarming predictions of great injury, if not absolute ruin, to the commerce of the country, if it shall become a law, but, singularly enough, I have not seen a single criticism upon it which was not based upon a misconception or a misrepresentation of its provisions and its effects. Let it speak for itself:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

Most of those who oppose this section, claim that it fixes the same rate per ton per mile for the short as for the long haul. If it was respectful, I would say that such construction is absurd, as language could not be selected which would more clearly negative that idea than the language of the section does.

The plain meaning is, that the carrier shall not demand a larger gross sum for hauling a car-load of grain or other freight over a part of its line, than it demands for hauling a similar car-load of the same class of freight over its whole line.

Section 6 provides, among other things:

That every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall print and keep for public inspection schedules showing the rates and fares and charges for the transportation of passengers and property which any such common carrier has established and which are in force at the time upon its railroad, as defined by the first section of this act. The schedules printed as aforesaid by any such common carrier shall plainly state the places upon its railroad between which property and passengers will be carried, and shall contain the classification of freight in force upon such railroad, and shall also state separately the terminal charges and any rules or regulations which in any wise change, affect, or determine any part of the aggregate of such aforesaid rates and fares and charges. Such schedules shall be plainly printed in large type, of at least the size of ordinary pica, and copies for the use of the public shall be kept in every depot or station upon any such railroad, in such places and in such form that they can be conveniently inspected.

This section requires every interstate railroad company to fix and publish the rates at which passengers and property will be transported between the various points upon its road.

Now to illustrate the operation and effect of the short haul provision. We will suppose that the Pennsylvania road, extending from Chicago to New York, has fixed and published its rates upon a car-load of grain at $50 from Chicago to New York, $40 from Fort Wayne to New York, $30 from Pittsburgh to New York, and $20 from Harrisburg to New York.

The rates being so fixed, section 4 prohibits the company from charging more than $50 for a car-load of grain from any point between Chicago and Fort Wayne to New York, or more than $40 from any point between Fort Wayne and Pittsburgh to New York, or more than $30 from any point between Pittsburgh and Harrisburg to New York, or more than $20 from any point between Harrisburg and New York, circumstances and conditions being substantially similar in the shipments.

The justice of demanding a larger gross sum for hauling a car-load of freight from Pittsburgh to New York than is demanded for hauling a similar car-load of the same kind of freight from Chicago through Pittsburgh to New York can not be defended.

The chief object of the short-haul provision is to secure, at least, a measure of protection to shippers from non-competitive points. Shippers from competitive points find a degree of protection in the competition that exists; but the shipper from a non-competitive point is left to his election to accept the terms demanded by the carrier, however hard and unjust they may be, or allow his produce to perish upon his hands.

Another, but a secondary, object of the short-haul provision is, to restrain undue, reckless, and ruinous competition at competitive points, known as rate wars.

The history of the last ten years is not wanting in its many occasions upon which, in rate wars at competitive points, rates have been run down to a ruinously low figure on through traffic, when the only alternative of the carrier was to make up the losses thus sustained by imposing an unjust and exorbitant tax upon the local traffic from non-competitive points which were at his mercy; but when he is made to understand that the law prohibits him from demanding a greater sum for carrying the same kind and quantity of freight over any part of his line than he demands for carrying it over his whole line he will be somewhat reluctant to commit the financial suicide which is involved in the through rates, which are not unfrequently fixed by angry, unreasoning, and reckless rate wars, and will allow a fair, reasonable, and healthy competition to fix a fair and reasonable rate for through traffic, which will fix maximums for local traffic on his line.

So far as I remember, every railroad man that was examined by the Interstate Commerce Committee expressed the opinion that, as a general rule, a larger sum should not be charged for the short than the long haul over the same line and in the same direction, but with equal unanimity they said that there were cases surrounded by exceptional circumstances which would justify the carrier in charging less for the long than the short haul on the same line, in such cases.

The bill admits that there may be such exceptional cases, and it provides for them. It fixes the general rule as the railroad men said it should be, and authorizes the commission to relieve the carrier from the operations of the general rule when exceptional cases are shown to exist.

This is the rule as applied to each common carrier upon its own road, but the bill authorizes and contemplates the creation of other carriers by the combination of connecting roads by contract for the purpose of establishing long lines for the transportation of through freights between points remote and distant from each other.

When such lines are established they may fix their own rates without reference to the rates fixed by the several carriers whose roads compose the long line.

To illustrate. You may connect New York and San Francisco by the combination of the following four roads: The Pennsylvania to Chicago, the Chicago and Northwestern to Omaha, the Union Pacific to Ogden, and the Central Pacific to San Francisco.

Each of these four roads may have fixed its through rate over its own line at $100 a car-load, the rates of the four aggregating $400 a car from San Francisco to New York, but the through line composed of these four roads may fix a rate through from San Francisco to New York at $200, or just one-half of the aggregate of the through rates of the four roads.

It may fix a rate of $150 from Ogden to New York and a rate of $100 from Omaha to New York.

If rates should be so fixed the through carrier could not demand more than $200 from any point between San Francisco and Ogden, to New York, or more than $150 from any point between Ogden and Omaha, to New York, or more than $100 from any point east of Omaha, to New York, or in other words, the maximum short-haul rate of that through line would be fixed by its long-haul rates and not by the rates of the several roads composing the through line.

When all the provisions of this bill are considered, and each fairly construed in the light of all the others, I can not see the possibility of injury to any carrier who proposes to deal fairly and justly with the public, and be satisfied with the reasonable income of a legitimate business.

Every carrier should be permitted to earn legitimate fixed charges, operating expenses, and a reasonable interest upon the actual value of its plant, but the public should not be required to recognize or pay interest upon either stocks or bonds which originated in the process known as watering, and which represent nothing but the avarice and cupidity of the speculator.

The producer and the carrier are dependent upon each other, and neither can afford to cripple or embarrass the other in a legitimate business, but each has the right to demand justice at the hands of the other.

The other provision of the bill objected to is that which prohibits pooling contracts.

I have always understood and still understand the object and purpose of a pooling contract to be the destruction of competition—a contract by which competing parties agree upon rates and a division of the business, or the proceeds of the business.

If this be true, as I am satisfied it is, it brings us to the simple question: Is competition beneficial or injurious to the business of the country?

If beneficial it should be encouraged, but if injurious to the public we should encourage combinations and monopolies and invite them to take charge of and control the various branches of the business of the country.

Why not extend the principle of pooling to fix and maintain rates to the men who sell the common necessaries of life as well as to the men who sell transportation? If it be a good and proper thing in the one case I can not see why it will not be equally good and proper in the other.

But I have a more serious objection to the freight pools now in vogue than that which is found in competing parties agreeing by contract upon rates.

The freight pool provides for a division of freights in fixed proportions between the pooling carriers, and under such arrangement no shipper can control his own shipment.

He may desire to ship over a road that he knows to be solvent and able to respond in damages for any injury to the cargo resulting from the negligence of the agents of the carrier; but the pool, not the shipper, determines the road that shall have the shipment, and his freight may be against his will assigned to an insolvent carrier.

All the good that pooling contracts can accomplish is accomplished by publicity of rates and adherence to the rates so published; while the evils of pooling are avoided by allowing a fair and honest competition in open market to fix reasonable and just rates and allowing every shipper to control his own shipment.

Being satisfied that none of the many evils which have been predicted will follow the passage of this bill, but that great good will result to the public and to the carriers, I shall vote for its passage.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator from Tennessee, who is a member of the committee of conference which reported back to the Senate a bill that is a direct contradiction of the expressed judgment of the Senate when taken upon the bill, in his attempt to show the character of the legislation and its effect upon the country, be so kind as to answer me now one single question? I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if, in his opinion, the natural and inevitable effect of the legislation of the fourth section of the bill will not be to increase through rates?

Mr. HARRIS. I am satisfied the effect of the bill will prevent what are known as rate wars, which sometimes reduce through rates to a ruinous point, and they ought to be prevented. But as to legitimate, honest, fair, and square through rates, there is not, in my opinion, a single feature in the bill which will necessarily increase them. Upon the contrary, I think the probabilities are they may be lowered, but at all events they will be uniform and stable.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am very much obliged to the Senator for that answer. He says if I understand him aright—and I think I do—that the tendency of the bill will be to establish equitable through rates and prevent rate wars. The bill confers upon a commission of five members the determination of the question as to whether a rate is a reasonable rate or not. The railway company may fix such rate as they please, but the commission have the revision of that rate, and they may make it such rate as in their view is reasonable. This, I take it, the commission will do; in short, the power to make reasonable within a certain limit is the power to make rates.

Very well, having fixed that through rate, which must be a reasonable rate, how then are the intermediate rates fixed? The bill declares that the intermediate rates shall not exceed the through rate, but are not the intermediate rates subject to revision by the commission also?

I wish to ask the Senator if the good people who demand this legislation would be satisfied that a rate fixed for a thousand miles and deemed reasonable by the commission would be accepted by the shipper as a proper and just rate for half the distance?

The inevitable result, therefore, is that unless every railroad company in this country goes into bankruptcy the through rate must be fixed at a point which will give a fair and equitable compensation. In other words, the through rate must be equitable and compensating to the railroads.

Now, let us apply it in practice. The Senator knows that, to-day, 90 per cent. of all the export product of this country is carried at rates which scarcely pay the cost of doing the work. That is the thing the Senator complains of—that the through rates are very low, and that the local rate is made correspondingly high to pay dividends. If the local rate is made reasonable in the same sense that the through rate is made reasonable, the natural and inevitable consequence is that the through rate must be made greater.

Now, what is the result as to our export product? The Senator very well knows that the question of the possibility of exporting products from this country depends upon the market. Who controls the market? India controls the wheat market and the grain market of London, where all our goods are marketed. England has spent $500,000,000 in a few years past to move the grain from the wheat-fields of India to the seashore. It has given cheaper food to England, and it has compelled in this country a reduction in the cost of transportation which was never deemed possible by any people.

In 1873 the rates were 2½ cents a ton per mile. In 1886 they were reduced to half a cent a ton per mile, and without any restrictive legislation whatever, but solely owing to the demands and the nature of commerce. The plan which the railroads have adopted to charge no more than the product would bear has moved the grain from the great grain fields of the West and put it in the London market in competition with India. Not to have reduced that rate would have been to put your corn in your stoves for fuel in the West, and leave India without a competitor in the London or other markets.

Mr. CAMDEN. Will the Senator explain one point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. CAMDEN. The product for export is raised in all the States from the seaboard to the great West. Take a farmer in West Virginia who raises wheat for export, take a farmer in Ohio who raises wheat for export, take one in Indiana who raises wheat for export, take one in Illinois, and so on until you get to Omaha. The bill does not ask or require railroads to charge any more to the far shipper than it does to the near shipper. Is there any reason why in regard to the product of all these several farms, being carried fifteen hundred or two thousand miles to reach the markets of the world, the near shipper should be discriminated against in favor of the far shipper, when they are all sending to the same market and for the same export purpose? It occurs to me that the fact is lost sight of that there are other sections of the country which make up the amount of product for export besides the border and the far Western States.

Mr. MCPHERSON. That is exactly what I want to aid the Senator from West Virginia and his constituents in securing. I say that no intelligent or wise commission would say that a rate from West Virginia equal to that charged from Chicago would be a reasonable rate. Hence it is that I say the natural and inevitable consequence must be that the bill must increase through rates in order that there may be an equitable and a reasonable rate charged for the shorter distance.

Mr. CAMDEN. I think the bill will increase through rates.

Mr. MCPHERSON. That is exactly the point.

Mr. CAMDEN. It will increase them from the very fact that the through rates have been too low in proportion to local rates.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then, so far as I have gone there can be no argument between the Senator and myself. He admits that the enforcement of this policy will compel high through rates.

Mr. CAMDEN. Let me ask the Senator a question. There is nothing in the bill which will require railroads to do otherwise than they are doing now. The bill does not prohibit them from charging as much for the short rates as they do for the long. But that is outside.

Mr. MCPHERSON. No; but you give the commission the power to fix rates. It is not only a power that is placed in their hands, but it is a responsibility which they must exercise.

Mr. CAMDEN. I beg pardon. The commission is not given the power to fix rates. I contend that Congress can not give to anybody the right to fix rates; but the commission can decide whether a rate is reasonable or unreasonable. That is the only point in the creation of a commission.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Very well; let me illustrate. Mr. A is the president of a great railway corporation——

Mr. CAMDEN. Let me add one word further in reference to that point. The commission has no power to enforce and control that question. Their decision is not final and they can not impose any penalty.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I think the duty of the commission is to make rates reasonable. If a rate is fixed for 500 miles which is the same rate as that fixed by the commission and declared reasonable for 1,000 miles, the intermediate shipper would have a right to complain to the commission. The commission is vested with quasi-judicial power. If the shipper fail to secure his rights from the commission he would make an appeal to a higher tribunal, the court which the bill provides for, and the natural consequence of that would be that no court on earth could decide that the shipper should pay the same rate for 500 miles that was paid for 1,000 miles, and still declare both to be reasonable.

Mr. CAMDEN. I ask the Senator whether that is not the law now. If a shipper should resort to the courts would he not get the same decision under the law as it stands now that he would under the bill?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I understand that there is no law now except the law which the carriers make for themselves. You propose to make a law, and you propose to put the power in the hands of five commissioners to change a rate which is equivalent to fixing the rate.

Now, let us see about a reasonable rate. For instance, the president of a railroad, or a number of them, in the city of Chicago declares that a reasonable rate shall be a rate of $100 per car-load of 10 tons from Chicago to New York. Now step in the commission, and they have the power under the bill to declare that that would be an unreasonable rate. Why an unreasonable rate? Because I take the evidence that you have given to the world here for the past five years, that you have been carrying like cargoes of freight, 10 tons each in a car, for $25 from Chicago to New York.

I wish to know by what right you charge a fixed rate of $100 a car for a like service which you have been giving for $25 a car.

When that rate is fixed by the railroad company, the commission say, no, it must be reduced. The railroad company have the right to appeal to the courts. What would the courts say? You are entitled, as a reasonable rate, to the cost of doing the work plus a fair compensation for the use of the capital invested in the plant. Now, what would that be? That would increase the through rates to a point that the through rates would be paying a share and part of the general fund of the railroads which was applied to the liquidation of debts and paying dividends.

Your through rate is fixed and your local rates must be fixed from it. I say that the inevitable result would simply be to increase through rates, and if the Western producer can stand that in the face of present competition then they can stand almost anything.

Mr. President, while I am on my feet there is one other point which I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee to explain. I understand from him that there can by no possibility be any such thing as an invidious distinction between railroads under the operation of this bill. Let me cite an illustration to the Senator and ask him to solve the difficulty sure to confront him. The city of Buffalo is at the eastern end of Lake Erie, which is the terminal point for the great lake transportation of the West. Cargoes of grain come from different points of shipment in single vessels, by single owners, to Buffalo. That grain is discharged into a single elevator in bulk often and always. That is the end of the transportation so far as the lake is concerned and so far as the carrier to Buffalo is concerned.

At Buffalo this grain is met by six great lines of railroad, reaching Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and Montreal. The shipper from Buffalo elects to take the line of railroad which will reach any of those points of shipment, depending as it will be largely upon the best rates of transportation obtainable from those seaports to London.

This grain at Buffalo is the original point of shipment in its relation to those six railroads, as any point in the United States can be. Two of those roads are Canadian roads, lying within the Dominion of Canada, and beyond our jurisdiction. One of them is a State railroad, running within the borders of a single State, from Buffalo to New York. Therefore, we can neither fix through rates nor local rates upon any of these roads. They are outside our control under this bill.

Now, what of their competitors? Three lines of road, the Erie, the Delaware and Lackawanna, and the Lehigh Valley are interstate railroads laid upon the territory of three States. In the first place, the commission from Buffalo eastward will make the rate from Buffalo reasonable. That determines the rate from all intermediate points. As to the other three lines it can not say a single word. They may make the most unreasonable rate imaginable. They may pursue the present policy pursued by railroads, which is simply to take the product for what it will bear. The through rates from Buffalo eastward by the Canadian lines and the New York Central are beyond anybody's control except their own, and whatever they may do touching a through rate it does not interfere with their local rate. Hence they may drive the three interstate railroads out of the competition at Buffalo.

First, I say that the Canada railroads would have the power under this bill to take the products at Buffalo and carry them to Montreal, and thus oppress the three interstate railroads on this side to such an extent that the securities of these roads would depend on the will of a foreign corporation; their securities would become the foot-ball of Wall street, and the quotations or values from day to day be dictated from Canada. That would be the practical operation of it, and without the proviso in the fourth section would destroy half the railroad property in this country. If, however, the commission shall find in this proviso a grant of power to them sufficient to meet such a case as I have described and to meet all cases when its exercise is needed—and I am sure this proviso fairly construed goes this far—and believing that the commission will apply this proviso power unsparingly, I am content to give the section a trial.

Mr. HARRIS. The proviso of the fourth section confers upon the commission full and complete power whenever application is made to the commission and the commission has become satisfied after investigation that this is an exceptional case under exceptional circumstances which require that the railroad in question should be relieved from the general rule prescribed by the fourth section.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Very well. Then, I take it, the commission would find this an exceptional case and would relieve these three through railroads from the general rule. Having done that, then what becomes of other rivals, the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore and Ohio, and other great lines which would not be relieved because the special case did not apply to them? They would be under the general interstate-commerce law, while the commission would have relieved the three interstate railroads from Buffalo, and they would be outside the interstate-commerce rule.

No, sir, it will not be possible to conduct the commerce of the country under the fourth section without the fullest exercise of the power granted in the proviso. What a commentary upon this Senate upon the ill-advised, reckless character of the legislation we make, that a law must contain the power within itself to annul or make void its enforcement.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEORGE. I understood the Senator to say a while ago that the case of some carriers might be special owing to peculiar circumstances. If that be true what harm would occur if the Pennsylvania Railroad and the other railroads engaged in through travel were not interfered with? They do not lose anything by it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator will understand in that event they would lose all their through traffic. That, as a matter of course, a line of railroad between given points, say, the Pennsylvania Railroad between New York and Chicago can afford to carry through freight cheaper than local freight.

The majority of the freight brought from Chicago to the seaboard scarcely pays the cost of moving it, but at the same time I think it is a decided advantage to the railroad to have it, for reasons so often stated I need not repeat them. I wish to say a word about the pooling section, but will not do so now, as I seem to be occupying the time of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to trespass on his good nature, and ask him one question?

Mr. HARRIS. Most certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask him the same question which was asked of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] yesterday in regard to the case of the Boston and Albany Railroad, freight being delivered to it at Albany of the same character and in the same qualities from half a dozen different places. Take the case, for instance, of a ton of freight from California at a low through rate. Would the portion which the Boston and Albany Railroad should receive on account of that freight fix any limit for freight delivered at Albany by a local shipper, or freight shipped from Buffalo or from Syracuse to go over the Boston and Albany road?

Mr. HARRIS. This bill authorizes two or more common carriers to unite to make an extended long line of transportation, and that long line becomes a carrier independent of and separate from either of the lines and all of the lines that compose it. That common carrier so created by contract has the right of all other carriers to fix and publish its rates from one end of the line to the other, from the intermediate points to the end of the line as long as two or more carriers or companies are involved in the carriage.

Now, take the case that I put where the combined carrier composed of four independent roads fixes a rate of $200 from San Francisco to New York, of $150 from Ogden to New York, of $100 from Omaha to New York. Then the rule would be, as I understand it, that that carrier can not charge for a car-load of freight from any point between San Francisco and Ogden to New York more than $200. It may charge that much under the fourth section. It can not charge more than $150 from any point between Ogden and Omaha to New York. It may charge that much under the fourth section. It can not charge more than $100 from any point east of Omaha to New York. It may charge that much under my construction of the fourth section.

Mr. ALDRICH. I fear that I failed to make myself understood in my question to the Senator from Tennessee. The question I will repeat in another form. If the Boston and Albany Railroad receives a certain sum as freight in the aggregate for the transportation of a barrel of flour from Albany to Boston, that flour having been shipped from Chicago, is that a measure of the compensation which it must charge and receive for a local shipment from Albany to Boston?

Mr. HARRIS. That would depend entirely, in my opinion, upon whether this was a continuous and through shipment from San Francisco to Boston, or whether it was a shipment to Albany and then reshipped to Boston.

Mr. ALDRICH. Suppose it to be a through shipment?

Mr. HARRIS. That I have already answered by what I have already said. The short-haul provision would only affect that shipment, as I have already explained. It would fall within the last and lowest through rate made by that carrier. For a short haul more can not be charged than the maximum of the long haul.

Mr. ALDRICH. But, as I understand the Senator now, the aggregate compensation received in one case would be no measure and no criterion of the actual sum to be charged upon another.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the importance of this bill will not only justify but demands the fullest consideration which the Senate can give toit. It proposes to deal with questions that may affect seriously not only the vast railroad systems of the country, but all other common carriers engaged in interstate commerce. When we consider the number and length of the railroads of the country, the vast expenditure in their construction, and the great number of persons engaged and interested in their operation—to say nothing of the common carriers upon the natural highways, the rivers and navigable streams of the country, and the value of the property, and the number of persons connected therewith—the necessity for due and careful consideration will at once appear. Nearly all our artificial as well as natural highways are mediums of interstate commerce. Almost every railroad, by consolidation with other lines, becomes a part of a system extending over contiguous and even distant States, forming links in chains of railway which bear to market the traffic of distant communities and furnish the means of intercourse and travel for citizens of different States of the Union.

If we look therefore only at the vast interests of the common carriers which may be affected by the bill, it is sufficient to challenge the most careful examination in order that no injury may unwittingly be inflicted upon interests so great, not imperatively demanded for the protection of the people who are compelled to use those mediums of commerce in the transportation of their persons and property from one State to another. In the consideration of this bill it is proper also to take into account the vast amount of traffic, to say nothing of travel, carried on over these railroads and navigable streams, and dependent upon common carriers not only for the means of transportation but also very largely for its value. It has been estimated that our domestic commerce is not less than $18,000,000,000 annually, and much of this large amount is dependent upon the common carriers for transportation and forms a large part of interstate commerce dealt with by the provisions of this bill. No member of this Senate does, and I may say no sane man can, desire to see injury inflicted upon the common carriers of the country or the commerce dependent upon them for transportation.

The bill deals with the carriers of interstate commerce alone, but as I have already said this designation applies to almost every railroad and navigable stream in the country, so that it may be said that almost all the commerce carried on by rail or water may possibly be affected by the provisions of this bill as well as the carriers themselves. Great, however, as may be the interests to be affected by the passage of this bill it is before us for our action, and we must meet the responsibility imposed upon us, as I have no doubt every member of this body will do, with an earnest desire to deal justly and fairly with every interest involved. That Congress has the power to make rules regulating commerce between the States of the Union will not be denied by any one. Indeed, such power is expressly given in the Constitution, and has never been questioned in any quarter, however much the propriety of its exercise in particular cases and the extent to which it may have been carried may have been doubted.

At the time of the adoption of the Constitution in which this power was granted by the States to Congress interstate commerce was carried on almost exclusively by the natural highways of commerce—the rivers and other navigable waters of the country. No one thought of railroads or other medium of overland transportation, unless the idea of short canals connecting neighboring streams had at that early day been conceived. More than forty years elapsed from the adoption of the Constitution and the grant of power therein to Congress over the subject of regulating commerce between the States before any railroad was projected in the country. It is very doubtful, at least, whether such an unrestricted grant of authority to Congress to regulate interstate commerce would have been made had the framers of the Constitution believed that it would be ultimately carried on by artificial highways constructed under State authority. I think it may be safely affirmed that the States never would have consented to surrender the entire control over roads created by their authority within their own limits, even when engaged in interstate commerce by reason of connection with other lines of road.

Almost all the railroads in the country have been constructed under charters granted by the States. They owe their existence and franchises to the States that created them, and generally their charters have conferred upon them exemptions, privileges, and immunities of the most valuable and liberal character. The anxiety of the people of the several States for railroad facilities has induced their Legislatures to grant to these companies all the rights and privileges deemed essential for their successful operation, and not infrequently have granted them pecuniary aid as well as valuable exemption not enjoyed by natural persons. Until very recently no one doubted that the States themselves might exercise a supervisory control over these corporations created by their authority and existing within their own limits and jurisdiction, unless they had deprived themselves of such control by express provisions in the acts incorporating those companies.

But by recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States it seems that railroad companies existing under State authority, and claiming every right which they enjoy by virtue of that authority, may withdraw themselves largely from the control of the power that created them by forming connections with other roads chartered by other States so as to form a part of a continuous line for the transportation of commerce from one State to another.

Now, while I do not believe that the decision referred to—"the Wabash, Saint Louis and Pacific Railway Company vs. The People of the State of Illinois"—is a correct interpretation of the power of the States over their own corporations, and think the opinion of the dissenting judges more in accordance with the true intent and meaning of the provision of the Constitution relating to the regulation of commerce, still I recognize the decisions of that court as fixing a limitation on the power of the States over the roads which they have created; and the investiture of Congress with the only control that can be exercised over any railroad management, which, by connections and consolidations, forms part of a continuous line of railway over which commerce may be carried on between persons residing in different States of the Union.

If the States could exercise what I believe their just rights, and protect their own citizens against unfair discriminations and extortions, I should prefer to leave to them the absolute control of dealing with the questions embraced in the pending bill. No State would legislate oppressively upon her common carriers. The dependence of her people upon them for transportation would insure the railroads against hostile acts, independent of the potent influence which such corporations are supposed to exert wherever they exist. I have not much doubt that it would be better both for the railroads and the people if this whole question could be dealt with by the States. But since this is not permitted—and no State can now interfere with the operation of any railroad company, however extortionate and unjust, which is engaged in interstate commerce—the only remedy possible is such as Congress may provide.

The question is therefore presented broadly and distinctly: Shall Congress interpose a restraining hand upon these corporations or shall they be permitted to do as they please in their dealings with the vast interests dependent upon them—discriminating, in the facilities which they afford and the charges which they exact, between different persons and communities—exacting from some more than just compensation for services rendered, to indemnify themselves for losses sustained by favors and privileges awarded to others? These discriminations and unjust exactions have brought this question here. Complaints have been made from time to time, many of them perhaps without just cause, and appeals for relief have been heard from every quarter. Shall Congress now attempt a remedy or respond to these appeals by a refusal to do anything to correct abuses?

And, now, Mr. President, turning to this bill, I desire to say that I am not at all sanguine that it will prove an adequate remedy for the wrongs it seeks to correct. It is the commencement of legislation new to Congress, and deals with questions upon which we have no experience in this country to guide us.

Any legislation upon the subject must necessarily be very largely experimental. What its effect upon common carriers or upon shippers may be, is but a matter at present of conjecture. Time, however, will reveal the defects of the bill, should it become law, and future legislation can remedy its errors. Should action be deferred for years to come, it is doubtful whether Congress would be better qualified to legislate upon the subject.

This bill has been very maturely considered in both Houses and is the result of the best judgment that could be formed upon the subject. If it proves adequate as a remedy for existing evils in the transportation of persons and property, without doing injustice to carriers, it will prove a boon to the country of inestimable value. If it fails as a perfect remedy and leads to future legislation which shall have that result it will be no less salutary and beneficial both to the common carriers and to those who are compelled to use them. Let us turn now to the provisions of the bill to see what it proposes. I shall refer very briefly only to some of the more important provisions of the bill and shall not consume the time of the Senate further than is necessary to indicate my opinion in reference to them.

The first section of the bill defines the class of common carriers to which its provisions apply, namely, such as are engaged in interstate commerce; and exempts from its operation such as are operating wholly within the limits of one State, and then provides that all charges for the transportation of persons and property by such carriers, including all services rendered therewith, shall be reasonable and just, and declares all unreasonable and unjust charges for such services unlawful. No one, I suppose, can object to this provision of the bill. Differences may arise as to what constitutes an unreasonable and unjust charge, but no one will contend that any charge should be made that is not just and fair. The railroads may not desire that any interference should be had with their right to charge what they please for any service they render, but they will not contend that any injustice is done to them in prohibiting and declaring unlawful all unjust and unreasonable charges which they may make. There is nothing in this section, therefore, to which a valid objection can be made.

The second section prohibits and declares unlawful any discriminations between persons made by common carriers in charges for "transportation of like kind of traffic under substantially similar circumstances and conditions," whether such discriminations are made "directly or indirectly by special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device. This provision is designed and will doubtless have the effect to break up a practice which is said to obtain in railroad management of charging large shippers and favorites less than is charged to those who ship less. While the railroads doubtless make more profit from the business of large shippers than is realized from the business of smaller shippers, and perhaps from its bulk can really afford to carry their freight at a less rate, still such discrimination has been a source of constant complaint and has operated to the prejudice of the small shippers by enabling their favored competitors to outbid them for the goods which they thus ship at a lower rate. Such discriminations will, in the judgment of mankind, always be deemed unjust, and the bill wisely and properly seeks to prevent them.

The third section of the bill makes it unlawful for a common carrier "to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic in any respect;" and it also makes it unlawful for any carrier "to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect." What would constitute "undue and unreasonable preference or advantage" or "undue and unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage" is not specifically declared, and for that reason apprehensions have arisen in the minds of very worthy and intelligent persons that it imposes improper restrictions upon common carriers, and will operate to the prejudice of shippers of certain classes of produce who need special accommodation in the transportation of their goods to market.

Perishable freights, for instance, require rapid transit in order to prevent decay and loss in marketable value, and it is very natural that shippers of such products should feel anxious that no impediment should be placed in the way of securing the necessary and customary facilities which they enjoy for the speedy delivery of such freights to the markets to which they are consigned.

In my own State, as in many other sections of the country, the cultivation of fruits is a very important industry, and the growers and shippers of fruits, by arrangements with the railroads, have for years enjoyed the necessary facilities for the speedy delivery of their products to market. Without such facilities their produce would have comparatively but little value, and the fruit culture would have to be abandoned.

If it were possible to put a construction upon this section which would prevent the railroads from giving every needed facility for the rapid transportation of perishable articles, or impair in the least the opportunities which such shippers enjoy, I could not and would not vote for the bill; but I do not believe such construction possible. It would not be held by any railroad company or any court in the country to be an undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to send forward with the greatest possible rapidity freight of this character, so as to secure its delivery in good order in the markets to which they were consigned. On the contrary, a neglect or refusal to do so on the part of common carriers would clearly be regarded as an "undue, and unreasonable prejudice" and disadvantage to this "particular description of traffic," and violative not only of the spirit but the very letter of the law.

It would be as reasonable to suppose that the provisions of this section would prevent the running of express trains for the carrying of passengers as to suppose that it inhibits the running of rapid trains for the safe delivery of perishable freights. All apprehensions felt in any quarter in this regard are in my opinion unwarranted by anything contained in the third or any other section of the bill. I will add that the view which I have expressed in reference to this matter is in harmony with the opinion of all the members of this body with whom I have conferred, and some surprise has been expressed that any different opinion could be entertained by any one.

Independent of any obligation imposed by the provisions of this bill the duty of common carriers to the public would compel railroads to provide the proper facilities for shippers of this kind of freight, and that duty would not be properly performed by furnishing only the same accommodation required for other produce, such as lumber, grain, &c. All common carriers take into consideration the character of the service required; and, recognizing the obligation which their relation to the public imposes, seek, if under intelligent management, to meet the just demands upon them.

Besides this, self-interest would prompt the carrier to grant all needed facilities for the prompt delivery of perishable freight, as otherwise they would destroy a very profitable part of their business. With nothing in the bill to prevent special arrangements for the appropriate and necessary rapidity in forwarding freights requiring speedy delivery, I can not conceive that any apprehension need be felt that the duty imposed by their relation to the public, and enforced by self-interest, will not be faithfully performed.

The fourth section of the bill reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kind of property, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line, in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance; but this shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance: Provided, however, That upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorized to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may from time to time prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this act.

The strongest opposition that I have heard to the bill has been to this section. The railroads of the country have, perhaps without an exception, at times discriminated against persons and localities at intermediate points between the termini of the roads. In some instances this has been so excessive as to amount to the grossest injustice, and has been felt by those subjected to such charges as oppression and extortion.

The fourth section proposes to limit the exactions of the carriers in their charges at intermediate points, so as to prevent a greater charge for the shorter than the longer distance. It will be observed that it does not attempt to prorate charges according to distance, but simply to prevent a higher charge for the shorter distance than is demanded for the longer haul. This limitation however only applies to transportation of "passengers or like kind of property under substantially similar circumstances and conditions."

Now, one of two things is certain, either the compensation for the longer haul under present arrangements is inadequate, or that for the shorter distance is excessive—and I think it reasonable to suppose when such discrimination exists that the charge for the shorter distance is increased to indemnify the carrier for inadequacy in compensation for the longer service. Whatever may be the reason for the discrimination in prices for the same kind of service on the same line of road, the public mind will not readily apprehend the necessity or justice of requiring a higher price for the shorter service, but, on the contrary, will continue to regard it as an unjust exaction which should be prohibited.

This provision I believe to be even more liberal to the carrier than it should be. It allows the carrier to charge as much for the shorter distance as for the longer, except as restrained by the requirement that the charge must be reasonable, and gives to the commissioners authority to allow greater charges for the shorter than the longer distance—an authority that is liable to be abused, as every power may be that rests simply in the discretion of those who may be called on to exercise it. This provision has been so fully discussed in this Chamber that I shall content myself with this succinct reference to it.

I desire, however, to say in connection with this, that I have no apprehension that the railroad interest will not be able to protect itself. Associated wealth always, and in all times, has been fully able to protect itself, and I am sure that there will always be gentlemen in both Houses of Congress whose sympathies will prevent them from consenting to any injustice to railroads or other common carriers. So I do not see that I am called upon here to defend especially the interests of railroad companies.

I will say further, before proceeding to the next section, that the discretion vested in the commissioners to be appointed under the bill to allow a less charge for the greater than the shorter distance ought not to be exercised to the extent of defeating the purpose of this section. It is fair to presume that the President will appoint, if the bill becomes a law, commissioners who will act with due caution and suspend the operation of the law only when circumstances may render their interference necessary to relieve the carrier from embarrassment by reason of competition with other lines.

The fifth section makes it unlawful for any common carrier to enter into any agreement with other common carriers for the pooling of freights of different competing lines. It is well known such competing lines have, at times, made such agreements which have operated to prevent the advantages to the public which just competition would secure. The chief value of pools, however, to the competing lines has been to prevent the cutting of rates in a spirit of rivalry to a point ruinous to the carriers themselves, and only of temporary benefit to the public. I apprehend that the prevention of what is known as railroad wars is the main reason for the pooling arrangements which have existed, and if they could have that effect, without interference with proper and healthful competition between competing roads, no valid objection could be made to such arrangement.

The people of the country can not be permanently benefited by railroad wars and the cutting of rates to a ruinous extent, and if pooling arrangements between carriers would prevent such strife and not advance charges above fair compensation for services rendered, they would do no harm to any one.

Under the provisions of the fourth section of the bill it seems to me that pooling arrangements can not be of much value to carriers. They will not be likely to cut rates at competing points so readily as formerly, because it would affect charges along the whole lines of their roads. Heretofore they could cut rates at the points of competition to any extent without interference with rates at other points on their respective roads, but under the provision of the fourth section of the bill charges would be reduced at many places on the roads if rates were greatly reduced at the points of competition.

I do not see that this fifth section of the bill will be of much value to the public or of any great disadvantage to common carriers should this bill become a law. Under the present condition of railroad management I can understand how the system of pooling was conducive to the interest of all roads connected with the pool, and how it may have interfered with the proper competition which would otherwise have ensued, and thus worked injury to the public by depriving the country of the advantages of such competition.

I shall not notice in detail the other provisions of the bill. They relate principally to the appointment of a commission and the duties with which it is charged, and the authority with which it is invested; in other words, to the machinery with which the sections of the bill to which I have already referred are to be enforced.

I shall give to the bill my support, and hope it may prove a wise and beneficial measure, not only to the people of the country, but also to the common carriers themselves. I would not knowingly aid in inflicting a wrong upon the railroad companies and other carriers, but would restrain to the full extent of Congressional authority any injustice which they may practice upon those who are dependent upon them for the transportation of their persons and property. I recognize the value of such corporations, and the great benefits they have conferred in the development of the country and the advancement of its prosperity. We can not do without them, and they should be protected in every just right and subjected to no unnecessary and improper restraint; but they ought not to be allowed, because they are indispensable, to lay too heavy a hand upon any portion of the people who are compelled to use them.

Nor ought the interference of Congress with this question of regulating interstate commerce, carried on by the instrumentality of railroads, to be longer deferred. Since the States may not pass any law bearing upon the subject, or restrain in any manner the action of the corporations which they have created in reference to commerce not wholly within their own limits, the people of the country can have no protection against any impositions practiced by such carriers, however unjust and extortionate, unless Congress does interpose for their protection. If no complaints had been made in the past—if the dealing of the railroads had been at all times marked by the strictest justice and they were free from the charge of improper discriminations or oppressions of any character, still it would be unwise to leave in their hands a power which might hereafter be exercised to the prejudice and injury of the people of the country, and which it might be more difficult hereafter to check and restrain than it is at present. We know something now of the power and influence of these corporations.

In some of the States of this Union they are believed to be potent if not omnipotent in the control of legislation, and are supposed even insidiously to shape judicial opinions and control the judgments of courts. This estimate of their strength may rest more in apprehension than in fact, but it indicates, at least, the fear that aggregated wealth is calculated to inspire. Many of the men in the management of all the roads are doubtless persons of the highest character as well as the greatest intelligence, who would not willingly sanction an illegitimate use of the means at their command or the power with which they are invested, but they are but individuals in the bodies corporate and may not be able to control their action or determine their policy. Observation, too, has taught that men in their associate capacity will often do what they would not do upon their individual responsibility.

No guarantee is, therefore, furnished in the character of individuals composing railroad companies or controlling their management against the wrongs for which this bill provides or against the use of all the power they can command to prevent any restraint upon the absolute control which they at present exercise over the transportation of the commerce between the States of the Union.

Congress, therefore, should do something to restrain abuses at the present session, and as this bill is the result of the joint action of a committee of the two Houses after mature deliberation and reflection it is safe to assume that it promises the only relief for which the country may hope now or in the near future.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire to submit some observations on this report.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senator from Florida does not desire to speak this evening, the hour being late, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CULLOM. Before the Senator submits his motion, I should like to make a statement. I desire to say now that, as I said last week, I shall ask the Senate to remain in session to-morrow until this bill is disposed of. I made that statement several days ago, and I repeat it now, so that Senators may not be taken by surprise if they have forgotten what I said last week. I shall ask the Senate to remain in session to-morrow until the bill is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-one minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened; and (at 5 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 12, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 11, 1887.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D., of Washington, D. C.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction of bills and resolutions will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The Clerk completed the reading of the Journal which, as read, was approved.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Supervising Architect, recommending appropriations for extension of public building at Newark, N. J., and for heating apparatus in buildings at Augusta, Me., Clarksburg, W. Va., Leavenworth, Kans., Peoria, Ill., and Terre Haute, Ind.; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

CLAIMS ALLOWED UNDER ACT OF 1864.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with papers in each case, lists of claims under act of July 4, 1864, allowed by accounting officers since January 14, 1886; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

DRAINAGE OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The Speaker also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of War of an appropriation for sewer drainage of quartermaster's corral, Washington, D. C., and also referring to estimates for drainage for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CLERKS OF DISBURSING OFFICERS, MILITARY ACADEMY.

The Speaker also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with inclosure, a letter from the Adjutant-General of the Army in regard to services of clerks to disbursing officer and quartermaster, adjutant, and the treasurer at Military Academy; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HENNEPIN CANAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Board of Engineers upon the proposed acquisition by the Government of the Illinois and Michigan Canal and the construction of the Hennepin Canal, made in pursuance to a provision of the river and harbor act of August 5, 1886; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Mr. W. W. Corcoran, chairman of the joint commission for the completion of the Washington Monument, transmitting its annual report; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES AND BRAZIL MAILS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, with inclosure, in response to a resolution of the House calling for a report upon the value of the service of the United States and Brazil mail steamship line for carrying United States mail; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

SCHOOL OF INSTRUCTION FOR CAVALRY, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 7192) to provide a school of instruction for cavalry and light artillery, and for the construction and completion of quarters, barracks, and stables at certain posts for the use of the Army of the United States, with an amendment by the Senate.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask unanimous consent that the House concur in the amendment.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out section 2 and inserting—

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to complete the quarters and barracks at Fort D. A. Russell, in the Territory of Wyoming, at an expense not exceeding $30,000, and to complete the quarters and barracks at Fort Robinson, in the State of Nebraska, for a garrison of ten companies, at a cost not to exceed $55,000; and there is hereby appropriated for the purposes mentioned in this section, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $85,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. What is the proposition?

The SPEAKER. The proposition is to concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman explain what the bill is?

Mr. BRAGG. The bill passed the House with a section providing for an appropriation of $175,000 for posts Russell, and Robinson in Nebraska. It was ascertained later that already there had been an appropriation out of the general fund which made the appropriation of the House larger than was necessary, so the Senate, under the advice of the Military Committee, reduced the appropriation from $175,000, as passed by the House, to $85,000.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. A most remarkable thing.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. BRAGG moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALLOTMENT OF LANDS TO INDIANS IN SEVERALTY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also lays before the House the bill (S. 54) providing for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes. Upon this bill the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House, and requests a conference. If there be no objection the conference will be granted.

There was no objection and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce the conferees on the part of the House some time during the day.

SEMON BACHE & CO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2871) for the relief of Semon Bache & Co.; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

RELIEF OF CHITTENDEN BROTHERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House an engrossed copy of the bill (S. 938) for the relief of Chittenden Brothers, returned from the Senate at the request of the House; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ROCKY FORK AND COOKE CITY RAILWAY.

Mr. TOOLE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10657) granting to the Rocky Fork and Cooke City Railway Company the right of way through a part of the Crow Indian reservation in Montana Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ARKANSAS, NEW MEXICO AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9107) to incorporate the Arkansas, New Mexico and Pacific Railroad Company.

The SPEAKER. Is it a public bill?

Mr. DUNN. It is a private bill, but it grants the right of way.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9107) to incorporate the Arkansas, New Mexico and Pacific Railroad Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I object to that bill, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DUNN. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will allow me to make a short statement in regard to the bill.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. It will do no good; I object to the bill.

Mr. DUNN. Still, I hope the gentleman will allow the statement to be made.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I have no objection to the statement.

Mr. BURROWS. There is no use in taking up time in making a statement, if the gentleman from Iowa is going to object to the bill anyhow.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] object to the gentleman making a statement?

Mr. BURROWS. I have no objection.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I desire simply to state this to the House, if I can have an opportunity——

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I object, Mr. Speaker.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT, OREGON.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1999), and that the same be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is it a public bill?

Mr. HERMANN. A public bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 1999) to create an additional land district in the State of Oregon.

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

Mr. HATCH. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

SAND-BAR IN RED RIVER, LOUISIANA.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Monday, January 10, 1887.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to inform the House what steps, if any, have been taken to cause the removal of the sand-bar which has formed against the piers of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Pacific Railway bridge spanning the Red River at Shreveport, La., and which for more than six months has entirely prevented the passage of boats through the draw of said bridge on a river navigable 300 miles above and 500 miles below the bridge.

Resolved further, That the Secretary inform the House whether or not the Department holds that it is the duty of said railway company to remove said obstruction, and, if so, what demand to do so has been made upon said company, when made, and their reply, and what steps, if any, have been taken to enforce the demand.

Resolved further, That the Secretary inform the House what steps the Department proposes to take to cause the removal of said obstruction.

Mr. BLANCHARD, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbor, makes the following favorable report:

"The Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to which was referred the resolution of inquiry addressed to the Secretary of War, relating to the sand-bar formed around the piers of the railroad bridge over the Red River, at Shreveport, La., have had the same under consideration, and report it favorably, with the recommendation that it do pass."

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILLIS, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 10419) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker, have points of order been reserved on this bill?

The SPEAKER. They were; but the bill was recommitted, and is now again reported.

Mr. EDEN. I desire to reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] reserves all points of order. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

VENTILATION.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol be, and he is hereby, directed to place similar ventilating apparatus in the kitchen of the House restaurant in the Capitol to that now in use in the Senate restaurant; and the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives is hereby directed to provide, in one of the general appropriation bills, for the necessary expenses of this change, not to exceed the sum of $1,500.

ARIZONA NARROW-GAUGE RAILROAD COMPANY.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 10636) introduced yesterday by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. BEAN], entitled "A bill granting the right of way to the Arizona Narrow-Gauge Railroad Company through the White Mountain Indian reservation, in the Territory of Arizona," was by mistake referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It should have gone to the Committee on Indian Affairs. If there be no objection, that change in the reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 7988) granting an increase of pension to Bryant Waters; when the Speaker signed the same.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON HON. W. P. PRICE.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that Wednesday, the 9th day of February next, at three o'clock in the afternoon, be fixed for the consideration of resolutions relating to the life and character of Hon. WILLIAM P. PRICE, late a member of this House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BENNETT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for the bill (H. R. 5050) a bill (H. R. 10658) to provide for terms of United States district court at Raleigh, N. C., and change the line between the eastern and western districts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The bill (H. R. 5050) was, by unanimous consent, laid on the table.

ACCEPTANCE OF LANDS NEAR CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendment the joint resolution (S. R. 78) authorizing the Secretary of War to accept certain lands, &c., near Chicago, Ill.; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MILITARY POST NEAR DENVER, COLO.

Mr. BRAGG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, also reported back with amendment the bill (S. 2477) making an appropriation for the establishment and erection of a military post near the city of Denver, in the State of Colorado; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN M. HARTMAN.

Mr. VIELE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 5377) to relieve John M. Hartman from the charge of desertion; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT TERRE HAUTE, IND.

Mr. OWEN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back favorably the bill (S. 430) to change the limit of appropriation for the public building at Terre Haute, Ind.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

RHODA WILLIAMS.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2181) granting a pension to Rhoda Williams; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH FORGEY.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back favorably the bill (S. 1825) granting a pension to Elizabeth Forgey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ELLEN M. STURTEVANT.

Mr. HAYNES, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10152) granting a pension to Ellen M. Sturtevant; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. HAYNES, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 7759) increasing the pension of George P. Ward; which was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CONGRESSIONAL FUNERAL COMMITTEES.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, reported back the bill (H. R. 10077) to prohibit the appointment of Congressional committees to attend funerals at public expense outside of the District of Columbia, and also to prohibit the draping of public buildings in mourning except upon order or by the authority of the President of the United States; which was laid on the table.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10659, as a substitute for the bill H. R. 10077) to prohibit the appointment of Congressional committees to attend funerals at public expense outside of the District of Columbia, and also to prohibit the draping of public buildings in mourning except upon the order of the President of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

OFFICIAL REGISTER.

Mr. FARQUHAR, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably joint resolution (H. Res. 229) providing for the distribution of the Official Register of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT HEALTH REPORT.

Mr. FARQUHAR, from the Committee on Printing, also reported back favorably joint resolution (H. Res. 222) authorizing the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, CHARLESTON, S. C.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of standing and select committees; and the hour for the consideration of bills begins at 17 minutes before 1 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. DIBBLE. I withdraw the demand, which is pending, for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. When this measure was last under consideration the gentleman from South Carolina moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and pending that moved to limit debate to ten minutes, and demanded the previous question. He now withdraws the demand for the previous question.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the debate on the pending section and all amendments thereto be limited to fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the motion to limit debate to ten minutes, and moves that it be limited to fifteen minutes on the pending section and all amendments thereto.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10051) for the erection of a public building at Charleston, S. C. By order of the House all debate on the first section of the bill and all amendments thereto has been limited to fifteen minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed one-half of the time allowed for general debate.

Mr. DIBBLE then addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on the pending section and amendments thereto has expired.

Mr. DIBBLE. I call for a vote on the amendment. It seems the time for the consideration of this bill is limited, and I do not want to imperil its passage. I therefore ask the committee to accept the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DIBBLE. To make the rest of the section conform to the amendment just adopted I move to amend in the fourteenth line by inserting "2" in place of "4," so that it will read:

Shall not exceed in cost the sum of $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 2 was read.

Section 3 was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. DIBBLE. To make this section also conform to the amendments already adopted I move to strike out "5" and insert "3;" so that it will read:

That the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, &c.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House with amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10051) for the erection of a public building at Charleston, S. C., had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CRISP. The next committee on call is the Committee on Pacific Railroads. If the House will indulge me just a moment I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the hour to-day be dispensed with; my reason for making that request being that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who has submitted an amendment to the bill reported by the Committee on Pacific Railroads that has not yet been printed in a form in which it can reach all the members, is not ready to go on. We have an understanding if it can be carried out by the House by unanimous consent to remove the order for the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill so that it may be open to debate; the purpose being to get the full two hours—one hour for the opponents of the measure and one hour in support of it—which we can not get if we go on to-day, a considerable portion of the hour having been already used. I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the hour to-day be dispensed with.

Mr. DINGLEY. That will lose an hour entirely for the other committees that may be called.

Mr. CRISP. The hour is about half gone. Of course if the proposition can be put in another form more acceptable to the House, I would make it in that way. Our object, I state frankly, is to put us in a condition that in the call on the next day that committees are called we would have an hour for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], representing the opposition.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not object to dispensing with the rest of this morning hour, but I do not wish it understood that there is any agreement as to what shall be done with this bill in the future.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no other agreement than that.

Mr. CRISP. I merely desired that the committee should have two full hours.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to dispensing with the remainder of the hour?

Mr. DINGLEY. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. I must object in justice to the other committees.

Mr. CRISP. I ask, then, that the Committee on Pacific Railroads be passed over to-day, not to lose its place in the call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Committee on Mines and Mining——

Mr. WILLIS. I do not understand that the request of the gentleman from Georgia has been granted.

The SPEAKER. It has not. The gentleman from Georgia made a request for unanimous consent that the Committee on Pacific Railroads be passed over for the present, not to lose its place in the call. The Chair was about to say that the Committee on Mines and Mining was passed over the other day in the same way, and that perhaps that committee desires to go on now.

Mr. CRISP. If that committee desires to go on to-day I withdraw my request, that committee being ahead of ours.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Mines and Mining is ahead of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and that is the reason why the Chair did not ask for objections until he had advised the House of the position of that committee.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let us understand what is proposed.

The SPEAKER. Nothing has been done in regard to the call of the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. CLARDY. I am instructed by the Committee on Mines and Mining to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 8084) to submit to the Court of Claims for adjudication the title of William McGarrahan to the Rancho Panoche Grande tract of land in the State of California, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LORE. I raise the question that this bill being a private bill is not in order under this call.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken under the rule which provides that this hour shall be only for the consideration of public bills.

Mr. CLARDY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether it is in order under this call to offer a resolution setting apart a particular day for the consideration of a bill?

The SPEAKER. It is in order under this call to take up a resolution already on the Calendar. The rule provides that under this call only those public bills shall be considered which have been previously reported to the House. If there is a resolution upon the Calendar fixing a day, the gentleman can call that up.

Mr. HILL. The bill has been reported to the House, and I desire to offer a resolution setting apart a particular day for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there such a resolution already reported and on the Calendar?

Mr. HILL. The resolution has not been reported.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that a resolution was offered fixing a day for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining, and was referred to the committee, and the Chair supposed it had been reported back.

Mr. HILL. I am instructed by the committee to report such a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read rule 24, clause 5, as follows:

5. After the morning hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees (or the call completed), the Speaker shall again call the committees in regular order for one hour, upon which call each committee, on being named, shall have the right to call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day, on either the House or Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds that he was correct, and that there is a resolution on the Calendar fixing a day for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. HILL. Then I desire to call up that resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Monday, the 24th day of May, 1886, after the call of the States and Territories for bills and resolutions, is hereby set apart for the consideration of bill (H. R. 8084) entitled——

Mr. HILL. I want to submit a motion to amend that resolution by striking out the "24th of May" and inserting "Wednesday, the 19th of January."

Mr. HAMMOND. What is the bill? The resolution has not been fully read.

The SPEAKER. The committee reported the resolution back with a substitute, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the resolution fixing Monday, 24th day of May, 1886, for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8084) on the Private Calendar, report the same back, with the following amendment, to wit:

Resolved, That Monday, 24th day of May, 1886 (after the call of States and Territories, &c.), is hereby set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. HAMMOND. I make the point of order that that is a private matter.

The SPEAKER. The resolution reported from the committee does not refer to any private bill.

Mr. HAMMOND. It proposes to provide for the consideration of a private bill.

The SPEAKER. Not at all. It proposes to fix a day for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining. The gentleman is probably misled by the fact that the original resolution which was referred to the committee did provide for fixing a day for the consideration of a particular bill; but the resolution as reported back from the committee, and as on the Calendar, is a resolution to fix a day for the consideration of business generally reported from the Committeee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. HILL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out "the 24th day of May, 1886," and insert "Wednesday, the 19th day of January, 1887."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman will explain what measure he proposes to bring up.

Mr. HILL. I will state that the committee desires to bring up all the business which has been before it, and has been reported to the House. There are two or three bills, some of a public and some of a private nature. One is the bill to incorporate a Board of Mines and Mining; another is the bill relating to the McGarrahan claim. Those are the two bills on the Calendar that have been reported from the committee, and the House may as well understand what they are.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr Speaker, I move to further amend the resolution by inserting, after the amendment of the committee, the words "after the hour for the consideration of bills."

The SPEAKER. That will be in order later. The first question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HILL], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out "the 24th day of May, 1886," and inserting "Wednesday, the 19th of January, 1887."

Mr. CRISP. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HILL] would have informed the House somewhat in detail as to the measures which he proposes to call up at the time set in his resolution. We are approaching the end of the short session of Congress, and there are many important measures on the Calendar demanding the attention of the House.

Mr. HILL. I will explain now, if the gentleman will give me an opportunity.

Mr. CRISP. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the gentlemen from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that there are on the Calendar two bills reported by the Committee on Mines and Mining. One is the bill to reorganize the Geological Survey, a measure which is the unanimous report of that committee. The other is the bill for the relief of William McGarrahan—a measure which has been pending in Congress, as every member well knows, for several years—a bill which has been unanimously reported not only by a committee of the Senate, but also, with one exception, by the House committee. This committee has not had an hour since the organization of this Congress for the consideration of its business; and I hope no objection will be made by any gentleman to allowing the committee to have one day, especially when the bills which it proposes to bring up are indorsed, not only by the committee of this House but by a committee at the other end of this Capitol.

I do not desire to go into a discussion of the merits of this claim now; and certainly the gentleman from Georgia will not ask me to do that, because it would require perhaps two or three hours. I trust the gentleman will not object to giving us a day for the consideration of our business. A technical objection has been raised this morning to the consideration of one of these bills; otherwise the two hours allowed under the rules to our committee would have been all the time we would have asked.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. How many bills are there to be considered?

Mr. HILL. We have two.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Would you be willing to drop the McGarrahan bill and consider the other?

Mr. HILL. No, sir; why should it be dropped any more than any other bill which has the indorsement of a committee?

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the Clerk to read the proposed order as amended, or desired to be amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the resolution fixing Monday, 24th day of May, 1886, for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8084) on the Private Calendar, report the same back, with the following amendment, to wit:

Resolved, That Monday, 24th day of May, 1886 (after the call of States and Territories, &c.), is hereby set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The proposed amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out "Monday, the 24th day of May, 1886," and insert "Wednesday, the 19th day of January, 1887."

Before the words "is hereby set apart" insert "after the hour for the consideration of bills reported by committees."

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state for the information of the House that we do not wish to take up any time in the consideration of these bills beyond the reading of the reports of the committee, which will require only a little time. We do not want the whole day for debate.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HILL] says that if we set apart a day for the consideration of this bill he will take up no more time than may be occupied by the reading of the reports from his committee. There are very many other reports on this McGarrahan claim. It has been here a number of years; it is hoary-headed. The Judiciary Committee of this House in the last Congress reported unanimously against it. The object is now to go behind a decision of the Supreme Court made very many years ago.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HAMMOND. Perhaps I am. I am only showing how gentlemen will differ upon this proposition. At last the question resolves itself into this—whether the House, at this stage of the session, will agree to set apart a day to consider the McGarrahan claim, for that is what the committee really propose to take up; that is really what they suggest as the measure which this House should stop for a day to consider. I think the House should not adopt such a resolution.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago this committee when called was passed over, in order to allow it an opportunity to come in at a later day. Now, the gentleman in charge of the bills of this committee makes a statement that all the time which will be desired by the committee will be time sufficient for the reading of the reports on the bills. If that is so, then I suggest to him there would have been sufficient time for the committee to have brought forward their bills in the morning hour of to-day and to-morrow, and to have finished the consideration of those measures. I therefore think it unwise for the House to agree to give this committee a whole day. The gentleman has stated that all the time they want is not more than that which would be accorded to them in the two morning hours.

Mr. CLARDY. In response to the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. OUTHWAITE], I will say that we have been prevented to-day from considering this bill in the morning hour because it is on the Private Calendar.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. You were not prevented from taking up the other bill—the bill to establish a commission of mines and mining, giving to it as much time for deliberation as, according to the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, it would require, and finally acting upon it.

Mr. CLARDY. That is very true; but the committee has felt that in one day, or even half a day, we would be able to consider both the bills which have been reported from this committee. While the one to which particular reference has been made, the McGarrahan bill, is a private bill, it is one which partakes of the nature of a public bill, and one which the committee reporting it believe that the good faith of this Government requires should be passed.

In reply to the gentleman from Georgia, I want to say that the Committee on the Judiciary of the last House of Representatives did not report unanimously against this bill. I believe, on the contrary, that no committee to whom this bill has been submitted of either House of Congress has ever brought in a unanimous adverse report.

Mr. HAMMOND. I did not say that the Judiciary Committee had reported unanimously against this bill, but that they had reported unanimously that McGarrahan had no claim, and that the Supreme Court had so decided.

Mr. CLARDY. I differ with the gentleman. I believe the minority of the committee emphasized the fact that he did have a claim, and a just one, and that the faith of the Government was pledged to the performance of the obligation imposed upon it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARDY. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is not this bill simply to send McGarrahan to the Court of Claims to have justice done him?

Mr. CLARDY. That is all. This bill reported by the Committee on Mines and Mining throws round the Government all the safeguards which any other bill looking to that question presented to this or the other House has done. Unless McGarrahan has a legal or an equitable demand against the Government, and that fact is established to the satisfaction of the courts of the country, he can not recover it, and the Government will not be involved in any liability.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. CLARDY. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not true that all McGarrahan asks is to have an opportunity to test the validity of his claim in the courts?

Mr. CLARDY. That is all.

Mr. HAMMOND. The quit claim the Supreme Court has long since decided.

Mr. FELTON. Is it not a fact this claimant has no claim, and that that was decided by the Supreme Court?

Mr. CLARDY. I could not, Mr. Speaker, in the time allotted to me, undertake to answer that question, but if I am required to give a categorical answer, I say "no."

Mr. SPRINGER. It seems, Mr. Speaker, this assignment, if made, will give one day of this session——

Mr. HAMMOND. To a private bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, to the consideration of a private bill. Now, the McGarrahan claim has been pending in Congress for many years.

Mr. HILL. I have another bill of a public nature.

Mr. SPRINGER. If this assignment is made the day will be occupied in considering a private bill which has been pending in Congress for the last ten or fifteen years. It is on the Private Calendar, and if there is to be an assignment for this business, I suggest it be Friday, as that is set apart, under the rules, for the consideration of private bills.

There are many public bills pending and demanding the attention of the House. I would be glad if the House on that day would proceed to the consideration of a number of bills of public importance, but I hope the assignment will not be made for the consideration of this private bill.

Mr. DUNN. I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment pending to strike out

"Monday, the 24th of May, 1886," and insert "Wednesday, the 19th of January, 1887."

Mr. DUNN. My amendment will not be in order to that.

The SPEAKER. When this amendment is disposed of, the gentleman can offer another. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HILL] to strike out the day fixed in the resolution, "Monday, the 24th of May, 1886," and insert "Wednesday, the 19th of January, 1887."

The House divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 35.

Mr. CRISP. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. CRISP and Mr. HILL.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 30.

Mr. CRISP. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. STEELE. I renew it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist on the point of no quorum?

Mr. STEELE. No; I withdraw it at the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to strike out the words "after the call of States and Territories," and to insert "after the hour for the consideration of bills."

Mr. HILL. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I move to add to the resolution the following proviso:

Provided, Not to interfere with revenue bills, general appropriation bills, river and harbor appropriation bills, bills forfeiting unearned land grants to railroads, or prior special orders.

Mr. HILL. That puts in all the business pending in the House, and there might as well not be any resolution at all.

Mr. DUNN. I hope my distinguished friend from Ohio will not lose sight of the fact that the business coming under the head of special orders heretofore made has been set apart by the House as that which is most important, urgent, and necessary for the public interest to be disposed of by this Congress. Standing at the head of that business is the free-ship bill, which is one of great importance, and a long list beside—which I will not take up the time of the House to read—of important measures which have heretofore been set apart by the House as special orders, and thereby emphasized as being important and urgent. I do not think business of this kind should come in and set aside the consideration of these important measures.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move to amend the amendment by adding the following:

Nor shall any private bill be called up on said day.

Mr. BURROWS. That is all right.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will not adopt that amendment. If the House desires to vote down the resolution on its merits, why not do so openly? Why attack it in this manner? This, as has been said during the course of this discussion, is a measure which has been pending so long that nearly every member of Congress is more or less familiar with its merits, and is doubtless prepared to vote upon it without further discussion. Now, if the House does not see fit to give the committee a chance to have their report submitted to the House, stating the facts and reasons upon which they desire the bill considered, I hope they will give us a straight, fair, and square vote on the resolution without attacking it in this manner by attaching to it an amendment subjecting the resolution to nearly every bill on the Calendar.

With all due respect to my friend from Georgia, I submit that this is not a fair way to fight a measure.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND. As private bills are out of order to-day, and his resolution was out of order until he made it general, I do not think it fair that under cover of a resolution providing for the consideration of general business, he should undertake to get a day set apart for the consideration of private business.

Mr. HILL. There is nothing covert about it, for the gentleman from Georgia and every member of this House who has heard me must have heard the statement as to the purpose of that resolution.

Mr. HAMMOND. I do not mean that there is any covert purpose, but simply that if the resolution itself had been a resolution to consider a private bill only it would have been out of order to-day.

Mr. CLARDY. But it is not a resolution of that character.

Mr. HAMMOND. Of course, and that is just the covert thing about it, that it undertakes to permit a private bill to come in under cover of general bills.

Mr. CLARDY. There is nothing covert about it. It is understood that that bill is to be considered.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in relation to an invitation which has been extended to this Government to appoint a delegate or delegates to the fourth international prison congress, to meet at St. Petersburg in the year 1890, and commend its consideration to the favorable attention of Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 11, 1887.

CONSIDERATION OF EDUCATIONAL BILL.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee on Labor, by unanimous consent, reported back as a substitute for House Miscellaneous Document 297, a resolution fixing Wednesday, January 19, 1887, for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7266) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

The original resolution was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to further consider the bill (H. R. 5190) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WILLIS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to inquire whether, if the motion of the gentleman from Missouri is voted down, it will be in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as I am instructed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to make that motion as soon as possible?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order, but it will be also in order to call up the special orders heretofore made by the House, and if the House declines to consider either of them, then the gentleman in that manner can gain the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIS. I want to give notice that if the House shall see fit in its judgment not to go on with this bill to-day, I will make the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HATCH, the House divided; and there were—ayes 105.

Before the negative vote was announced,

Mr. WILLIS said: Out of great respect to the judgment of the House I withdraw any further opposition.

So the motion of Mr. HATCH was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5190) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture.

There remains fourteen minutes of the time fixed for general debate on the bill.

Mr. HATCH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I shall support this bill most heartily, believing as I do, sir, that it is not only lawful but expedient. It has been one of the cherished desires of my life to see the great interest of agriculture—an interest that knows no State lines, no North, no South, no East, no West, the substratum of prosperity throughout the length and breadth of the land—recognized in this manner. To me, sir, it is no new or novel question. More than ten years ago, in my place upon this floor, I uttered language in support of this proposition which I desire to reiterate and repeat to-day; and I not only desire to repeat it, but I desire to emphasize it with all the additional weight which experience and observation and a lifetime of personal identification with this great national industry justify; and when it is facetiously asked by my esteemed friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER], whom I do not now see in his seat, what the Commissioner of Agriculture, when elevated to the dignity of Cabinet officer, shall do around the national board, I will not stultify myself or impair his just claims to statesmanship, either of head or heart, by attributing anything else to him than that it is simply a facetious inquiry.

What will a Cabinet officer do around a national board in portraying and setting forth the interests and the demands of the greatest question which stirs the people of this country to-day, secondary, in my humble judgment, to but one question which has agitated this Congress since its assembling? First, highest, and greatest of all is the reduction of the taxes of the people, among whom are a large percentage of the people who are represented in this bill and from whose hard earnings and toil and sweat a very large percentage of these illegal and oppressive taxes are daily extorted. What question is there in this country that is more intimately allied with every interest, whether of commerce or of production or any of the interests that animate this country, than the great question of agriculture? In the primeval days of this Government it was not considered a secondary question. The great father, the immortal Washington, in his second message to the Congress of the United States, called the attention of that Congress to this great and growing interest, and invoked for it legitimate protection; and I desire, Mr. Chairman, to repeat, word by word, the language which fell from my lips ten years ago in advocacy of this very measure.

The immortal Washington, in his second annual address to Congress, used the following language:

"The advancement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures by all proper means will not, I trust, need recommendation; but I can not forbear intimating to you the expediency of giving effectual encouragement as well to the introduction of new and useful inventions from abroad, as to the exertions of skill and genius in producing them at home."

And he adds:

"Nor am I less persuaded that you will agree with me in opinion that there is nothing which can better deserve your patronage than the promotion of science and literature. Knowledge is, in every country, the surest basis of public happiness."

The answer of the House, drafted by Mr. Madison, and adopted unanimously without alteration, fully indorses these sentiments. It said:

"We concur with you in the sentiment that agriculture, commerce, and manufactures are entitled to legislative protection."

Such, sir, were the wise and liberal sentiments of Washington, Madison, and their patriotic compeers respecting the promotion by Congress of these great sources of national prosperity and happiness. In these days of political degeneracy, and of departure from the well-defined landmarks of constitutional government, it is well to pause in our mad career of apostacy, and recur to the teachings of the founders of our political system. How striking the contrast presented in the earnest recommendation to Congress of these great interests by the father of the Republic, and the indifference and neglect with which they are treated by the legislators of the present day. While I am glad to admit that we have bestowed some care and attention upon our commerce and manufactures, what, I ask, has the Government done to foster and encourage this greatest of all our interests? The language of modern statesmanship is that "agriculture can take care of itself." Acting upon this mistaken and short-sighted policy, we are almost persuaded to withdraw even countenance and support from the only Department and representative it has in our national organization. If appropriations are asked commensurate with its demands and dignity, the application is ridiculed and denounced as the sheerest extravagance. Forgetting that this great interest supplies three-fourths of the revenues of the Government, and the entire food and clothing of the nation, furnishing all with an unselfish hand, there are to be found some among us who are inclined to withhold the appropriation of even a small sum of money for the distribution of improved varieties of seed, and to publish the annual reports of the Agricultural Department; even though, by so doing, they deprive the farmers of the country of the information which they both need and desire, the dissemination of which would contribute very largely to the development and improvement of all of our industrial interests.

As a Representative in the American Congress, I should rejoice to see the farmers of this country fully aroused to an appreciation of the superior claims which they have as a matter of right and justice upon this Government. And here I am free to say that, if our present financial condition were such as to authorize it, I should be ready to urge this Congress to so enlarge our Agricultural Bureau as to make it one of the Departments proper. Yes, sir; I would group together the leading industries of the country—agriculture, commerce, manufactures, mines and mining—and organize them into a department, with cabinet representation, and thus establish the grandest, most important, and beneficent branch of the Federal Government. The truth is, we have done so little for the protection and development of our agricultural industries, that we to-day find that two of its leading products, to wit, cotton and grain, which we never thought could find rivals anywhere, are not only being driven out of the foreign market, but are destined in a few years, if our present policy continues, to find active competition even at home—India sending cotton and Russia grain to the United States. But a little while ago we were boasting that cotton was king, and America the corn-house of the world. To-day, for the want of an enlarged and conservative system for protecting and developing our industrial resources, we find the scepter which we once held in proud triumph rapidly departing from our hands.

Now, I want any gentleman on this floor who can do so to point me to a single provision of this bill that infringes on the Constitution of the country, which I revere as much as any man on this floor. Why, sir, a few years ago it required five bushels of grain produced by a Western farmer to enable one bushel to reach a market in the East. And when I say to you to-day that the agriculturists of this country are producing the great staple of the country, which is your principal article of export, at an actual loss and selling it in your markets at less than the cost of production, I state to you what I know. Gentlemen may get up and talk about the increasing prosperity of this country, and point to the low rates of interest at the centers of the North and East as evidence of growing prosperity; whereas, I, coming from another section of the country, and other gentlemen well know that there is scarcely a dollar which goes into the production of this great staple that does not cost the producer of the soil 1 per cent. per month.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HATCH. I yield two minutes further to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. A few years ago the agriculturists of my State, embodying the assembled wisdom of my State, after a thorough investigation, predicated upon practical, every-day experience, stated that the actual cost of a pound of cotton in the cotton States was 8½ cents per pound; and that, while the average cost of the production of cotton is 8½ cents, the average price received from the sale has not exceeded 8¼ cents in the last eight years.

I should have liked that under other circumstances I had had the time allowed me to make further remarks on this question. I ask in conclusion who supply the commerce of the country but the producers of the country? Who are more interested in the great interstate-commerce bill, which is occupying just now with so much anxiety the minds of legislators at both ends of the Capitol? This industry is to-day suffering almost a pecuniary paralysis and needs every encouragement that legislation can give it and that it can receive from every source.

Mr. HATCH. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. PETERS. When this bill was last under consideration the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] took the position that there was nothing in the Constitution warranting the creation of a cabinet officer for the control of this Department. In that view I can not concur. The only provision in the Constitution providing for the creation of any cabinet office is to be found in section 2 of Article II, the part of which referring to this I will read:

The President may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices.

There is not a single sentence in the Constitution that directly authorizes the creation of any cabinet office; nowhere in the Constitution is the word "cabinet" mentioned. Like the word "agriculture," it is conspicuous for its absence. Nowhere are the words "Secretary of the Navy," or "Secretary of War," or "Secretary of the Interior," or "Secretary of State" mentioned in the Constitution.

Now, I take the position that wherever the Congress of the United States has jurisdiction over the subject-matter, then the manner of the exercise of that jurisdiction is a question of governmental policy and not of constitutional law. How do we obtain the right to control interstate transportation? Why, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] said, we obtain it through the power given in the Constitution to control and regulate commerce between the different States; yet when that provision was placed in the Constitution, our fathers, who placed it there, knew nothing of railroad transportation. Such a thing as a railroad, or a telegraph, or a telephone, or oleomargarine, was unknown to the fathers of the Constitution. [Laughter.] Consequently, there must be an enlargement of the meaning of the words contained in that provision of the Constitution before we can have jurisdiction to legislate at all upon the question of interstate commerce as it now exists.

Now, I say that Congress, having the jurisdiction to legislate upon this question of interstate commerce, the manner of the exercise of that jurisdiction is not a question of constitutional law, but, as I have already said, is merely a question of governmental policy, and the only question to be ascertained is whether the Congress of the United States has jurisdiction over the subject-matter. Now, it will not be denied that the Congress of the United States has jurisdiction over the subject of agriculture, and, having jurisdiction over that subject, as is evidenced by the large number of bills that have been passed from time to time, affecting the agricultural interests of the country, the one question remaining to be considered in connection with this bill, so far as the Constitution is concerned, is the question whether it is proper policy for us to control this matter of agriculture through a Cabinet position, or whether we had better control it, as we do to-day, by the supervision of a Commissioner of Agriculture.

As to the question of policy, I know it has been urged against this bill that it is not for the benefit of agriculture, and that all that the agricultural interest desires can be accomplished by State legislation. But what can State legislation do in regard to this subject. A State legislature has jurisdiction only over certain local matters which are almost equally within the control of the farmer himself. What the farmer desires to-day is that larger and broader legislation shall be enacted, taking into consideration the question of interstate commerce, the question of the tariff, the question of exports and imports, and a large number of other economic questions which affect the great agricultural interests of the State.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like a few minutes more.

Mr. HATCH. I have only two minutes remaining, and I have promised that time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was being discussed by the Committee of the Whole, the other day, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] expressed doubts as to whether the advocates of the measure proposed had read the Constitution lately; and he further insisted that there is not to be found in that instrument any authority for the creation by Congress of a department of agriculture and labor.

Now, sir, it may be deemed presumptuous in the extreme for one like myself to call in question the correctness of the views so eloquently expressed by the distinguished constitutional lawyers on this floor, who insist that to create a department in the interest of the industries of the country is "an abhorrent breach of the Constitution," as the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] puts it, and a bill "unconstitutional in its character," according to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER].

Sir, these are very grave suggestions, and whenever made in respect to any measure on which it is my duty to vote the obligations I took when I became a member of this body impel me to such an examination of the question as I alone can give. I can not yield this personal duty to another, not even to those who have made the law their study and have spent their lives in expounding it.

Section 8 of the First Article of the Constitution gives to Congress the right to "lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," and it is because "the constitutional function is prescribed in these express terms," says the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] "that we have a Treasury Department."

Now, I ask, has the gentleman read the entire section from which he quotes? "Not lately," I presume, for if he had he would have found that the power to provide for the general welfare is conferred upon Congress as clearly as the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. It must be borne in mind that nowhere in the Constitution is the power to create a department conferred upon Congress in express terms. Nor is there any allusion to the subject except the words, "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or office thereof."

Mr. Chairman, I submit that if Congress has the power to create a Department called the Treasury Department, and place over it a Secretary, because the express power "to lay and collect taxes" is granted in section 8, it has also power to create another department and call it the Department of Agriculture and Labor, because, in the judgment of Congress, the promotion of the "general welfare" can best be subserved thereby. Can there be any question about the propriety of fostering by judicious legislation such vast interests as those named in the bill under discussion? I know that it is claimed here that a special department of the Government is not necessary for this purpose; that notwithstanding the wealth of the nation is produced by labor performed by the people, Government should not in any way exert its powers for the protection of the wealth producer; that the laws of trade, so-called, are all that can be properly invoked to further the interests of those who constitute the large class who are to be vitally affected by the bill.

Mr. Chairman, there is a large party on this floor who have been schooled to think that government exceeds its just powers and proper functions whenever it goes further than to preserve order and to make life and property secure to its possessors; this done, the law of "the survival of the fittest" should have full sway. Sir, such deny that there is any "general welfare" clause in the Constitution that has any higher purpose than to provide for so collecting the taxes as to promote the general welfare. They are strict constructionists of such sort as to hold that there must be an express provision in the very words of the Constitution to warrant any proposed legislation; they forget "that the letter killeth and the spirit maketh alive."

The spirit of the Constitution rather than the letter furnishes authority to create any one of the existing Departments of the Government. The Department of the Interior was created not because of an express grant, but to meet a felt and legitimate want springing naturally and inevitably out of the growth of the country, and the ever-increasing needs of a people intent on reaping to the full the benefits and blessings of a progressive civilization.

When the words of the Constitution were penned there existed only the faintest intimation of the nation that we have even now come to be. Without steam navigation, without the locomotive, without a promise of the telegraph or telephone, and, what is more, without a realization of that new and mighty force in civilization which the absolute freedom of the individual citizen was destined to introduce, it is not a cause for wonder that the written words of the Constitution did not anticipate all future possibilities of the Republic. But it is certain that the great instrument on which this Government rests, when taken in the same spirit in which it was penned and adopted, is broad enough to bind in one happy and prosperous nation the yet unnumbered millions who are to become citizens of the several States that may compose it.

But, Mr. Chairman, this grand future can not be realized by looking back. Man was not made to be chained to the dead past; he must be free to move onward to higher and better conditions, or he must retrograde. Our noble Constitution may, and doubtless will, have to be amended in the future as it has been in the past, and legislation under it must likewise partake of the spirit of progress, or we as legislators will fail of meeting the requirements of the people whose representatives we are.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] seems to make a distinction in favor of what he terms the "old Constitution" of the United States. This peculiar language leads me to ask the gentleman, how old a Constitution must be to secure the benefit of his defense? And I especially desire to know if the amendments are full sharers in his patriotic devotion to that great document? It may be, sir, that he is one of a class who deny the validity of a portion of the amendments and who are anxiously awaiting the time when a partisan Supreme Court shall declare that they are of no binding force. Sir, I hope the gentleman had no such thought and has no such purpose, but that the oath to support the Constitution of the United States which he took in common with every other member on this floor was without any mental reservation whatsoever.

The pedestal on which the Constitution rests is the original Bill of Rights, and from that declaration came the guiding inspiration that penned the old Constitution and every amendment thereto. Nor can it be otherwise than that other amendments will be demanded to define such new powers as a free people may choose to clothe their Government with, in order to achieve the highest good of all. But, sir, there is no amendment required to fully authorize the legislation proposed in this bill. In my humble opinion, the time has come when legislators should keep step with the people; should realize that the world moves; that we as a nation have started upon a new career, a career of freedom, with all that that implies. Freedom means growth, and growth makes new conditions and calls for action suited thereto. Freedom means progress, and leads to prosperity for all, and security for all. It means that in a "government of, and for, and by the people" none shall be excluded from making their impress on it.

Those engaged in gainful operations in this country—by which is meant the agriculturist, the artisan, the manufacturer, the miner, the wage-worker, and all who go forth to their daily toil—comprise more than half of our entire population, and of these the agriculturists are the most numerous. Altogether these toilers constitute the very life of the Republic; they not only produce the wealth, but they pay the taxes, and they hold in their hand the ballot, which is the highest political power we have. Their prosperity is the prosperity of all; their strength is the nation's only reliance. Seven millions five hundred thousand men—which is 44 per cent. of our working population—are engaged in agriculture. Ten thousand millions of dollars are invested in farm lands, and four hundred millions in farm implements and farm machinery, fifteen hundred millions in live-stock for these farms, and the annual product of farms and stock is twenty-two hundred millions of dollars.

It must be conceded that the agricultural interests of the country, vast as they now are, and bound to be increased beyond any present comprehension, are alone sufficient to demand the care and the protection of a special department; but the bill goes further and very properly includes "labor in its relation to capital, the hours of labor, the earnings of laboring men and women, the means of promoting their material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity, and the best means to protect life and prevent accidents in mines, workshops, factories, and other places of industry."

It is difficult to give here the statistics of the various industries which would participate in the benefits of the department sought in this bill. These industries are defined with more clearness in the bill having the same general purpose, introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], but it is sufficient to say that the material interests of more than one-half of the entire population of the United States would, in my judgment, be promoted by the creation of the proposed new department. This bill proposes to give this important portion of the people a department clothed with such powers and directed to such duties as shall, by gathering and disseminating every pertinent fact, increase their ability to accomplish results.

Capital has availed itself of existing laws and has combined for its own protection and advancement. To this no one can reasonably object; neither can we, with reason, object to giving to those who alone produce capital the benefit of having a secretary whose duty it will be to represent this important element in the councils of the President.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen who oppose this bill tell us that it is because Government can declare war that we have a War Department. I ask such if it is not also true that Government can declare peace, and if so, may we not have a peace department?

The department sought for by the bill is emphatically a peace department—a department fully as important as that of war. The very men whose interests are to be promoted by the creation of the department sought are the men who fill our armies—if they are to be filled at all—and who win our victories, if they are won. And this is not all. When peace is declared they lay down their arms and return to their farms, mines, and workshops, and by their labor create the wealth that pays every dollar of the expense incurred in war.

Sir, we have a Navy Department—at least in name—and, for one, I think it ought to be strengthened for the protection of our commerce, should the time ever come when we have a commerce on the seas to protect; but, Mr. Chairman, the surest defense on sea or land that the great Republic can have is the prosperity and happiness of her people—of the very ones for whom the new department is intended, the bone and sinew of the land.

If, then, the War Department and the Navy Department are for national protection and therefore have the the right to be, why not give a department to that interest which as a means of national protection outstrips them both? I say outstrips them both, and I say it advisedly. Why, sir, there is not a nation in existence that will ever seriously entertain the idea of engaging in war with the United States, either by land or by sea, so long as our people are united and prosperous. With material resources unbounded, with numerical strength equal to the requirements of the largest army the world can produce, and with a reserve force on our farms and in our workshops full of ingenuity and capable of meeting any demand and every emergency, and with a debt-paying power which belongs to no other people on earth, if we are guided by counsels wise enough to demand of other nations nothing but what is right, and are firm enough to submit to no wrong, we shall not be menaced with war, provided our own people are prosperous, united, and happy.

Build the navy if you will, erect if you wish defenses for our extensive seacoast, for to do so will employ labor and use up our wasting raw materials, but this all done, our surest defense against invasion will be found in the well-paid employment of those who are workers on our farms, in our workshops and mines.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the bill recommended by the committee if the Committee of the Whole House does not substitute for it the bill introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], a bill which, in my judgment, has superior claims to support.

My reasons for preferring the bill introduced by Mr. REAGAN are that it provides for all that the bill under consideration does, and goes further and in a more comprehensive manner classifies various branches of agricultural activity, and defines the duties of each of the bureaus proposed in the bill. These are the bureau of agricultural products, the bureau of animal industry, and the bureau of lands. These several bureaus with the specific duties assigned to each, it seems to me, meet fully the requirements of agriculture.

In a like full and clear manner the Reagan bill provides for a division of labor, and a division of commerce, and it transfers to this division the duties relating to our domestic commerce, now devolved by law upon the Treasury Department. These several divisions, it will be seen, comprise all of the great industries of the country, and it seems to me that all of them should be comprised in the "department of industries."

Mr. Chairman, it is thought by some that the interests of our domestic or internal commerce are so at variance with those of agriculture and mining, and the other industries named, that it would prove unwise to unite them in one department. Sir, to me it appears that the seeming diversity of interests is not real, and that the establishlishment of a department, with its various bureaus gathering facts in relation to all these branches of industry, would show to the agriculturalists, the miner, the manufacturer, and transporter, what their real interests are, and would thereby tend to demonstrate the real mutuality of those interests.

It must be remembered that the men engaged in these several industries are fair-minded, and while each class demands the fair thing for its particular interest, it would not withhold from another class whatever is just and proper. What is needed especially is such light as all facts bearing upon production, transportation, and consumption will give; and these facts, which, under the provisions of the Reagan bill, are so certain to be gathered, should go together to the country and be known to every one of these branches of workers alike.

But, Mr. Chairman, I trust that no division of opinion as to which is the better bill will prevent favorable action on this proposition to create the new department. Sir, the rapid development of the several industries named in these bills admonish us that some plan should be devised to foster them that shall be able fully to meet their growing needs.

The legislation sought is not for the benefit of any section or any single State; it is for the entire body of toilers and wealth producers in the land.

Mr. Chairman, having endeavored to show that the creation of the new department of agriculture and labor is not only constitutional but is demanded, in order that the highest interests of the wealth producers may be promoted in a degree commensurate with their importance, I will only refer to one more argument in favor of this measure, namely, its necessity as a means of relieving existing departments of business burdens sure to be thrust upon them.

Whoever properly estimates the future growth of this country must conclude, with the new department created, and with all that is proposed to transfer from existing departments to the new one, enough will remain in the Departments of the Interior, Treasury, and War to fully occupy them, especially if these duties are well discharged. It should be remembered that the sixty millions of people we now number only marks the beginning of our growth; that our farms and mines, as well as our interstate commerce, are only in the infancy of their development; and if we act wisely we shall now, by the adoption of the proposed new department, make ready for proper governmental care of these growing interests.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate on this bill is exhausted. The bill will now be read by sections for amendment and consideration, under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That there shall be in said department an assistant secretary of agriculture and labor, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall perform such duties as may be required by law or prescribed by the secretary.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move to strike out that section, which I believe is the one that provides for an assistant secretary. I do not see any reason why there should be an assistant secretary, in view of the duties that are imposed upon the secretary by this bill.

Mr. HATCH. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] that that provision is in the bill reported from the Senate committee, and upon consideration the House committee deemed it very advisable that there should be an assistant secretary. A large portion of the duties of the secretary will require him to visit different sections of the country, and it is absolutely necessary that there should be a head of the department in his absence. I trust that the gentleman will not press his amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I have no disposition, Mr. Chairman, to make anything like factious opposition to this bill, but it seems to me that the duties imposed upon the head of this department are comparatively not so laborious as those of the heads of the other Departments of the Government.

Mr. HATCH. On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, I think that after the department is established it will develop into the largest and most important of the Executive Departments. The secretary will have to be absent a great deal in different sections of the country, and it will be necessary that some one should have authority to represent him at the head of the department here.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to press my objection, and I withdraw the amendment, simply saying that this looks to me like providing a useless office for some good Democrat to fill. [Laughter.]

Mr. HATCH. There will not be any objection to some good Democrat filling it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That there shall be in the department of agriculture and labor a division which shall be under the charge of a commissioner of labor, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The commissioner of labor shall hold his office for four years, and until his successor shall be appointed, unless sooner removed, and shall receive a salary of $4,000 a year. The commissioner shall collect information upon the subject of labor, its relation to capital, the hours of labor, the earnings of laboring men and women, the means of promoting their material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity, and the best means to protect life and prevent accident in mines, workshops, factories, and other places of industry. The secretary, upon recommendation of said commissioner, shall appoint a chief clerk, who shall receive a salary of $2,000 per annum, and such other employés as may be necessary for said division. The commissioner shall annually make a report in writing to the secretary of agriculture and labor of the information collected and collated by him, and containing such recommendations as he may deem calculated to promote the efficiency of the division. The secretary of agriculture and labor shall be empowered to inquire into the causes of discontent which may exist between employers and employés within the United States, and he may invite and hear sworn statements from both such parties concerning the matters in controversy. The secretary shall make a report annually to Congress upon the condition of labor in the United States, accompanied by such recommendations as he may deem important; and said reports, with accompanying documents, shall be printed and bound in a volume separate and apart from the reports on agriculture.

Mr. FORAN. I move to amend by striking out in line 7 of section 5 the word "four," and inserting "five," so as to read "$5,000 a year." I do not propose to occupy much time upon this amendment. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture will not seriously antagonize the proposition.

Mr. HATCH. I not only shall not antagonize it, but I shall vote for it. I believe that the importance of the position justifies the salary proposed in the amendment.

Mr. FORAN. Then I do not care to discuss the proposition. I ask that the amendment be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend by inserting after the words "hours of labor" in the 9th line of the 5th section the following:

The rate of wages, the cost of production of the articles produced, and the increase in the productive efficiency of labor.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. That is all right.

Mr. HATCH. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the act approved June 27, 1884, establishing a Bureau of Labor, is hereby repealed.

Mr. HATCH. I understand that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] desires to offer an amendment and to submit some remarks.

Mr. MURPHY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I move, pro forma, to amend by striking out the last line of this section, and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that there should be no opposition to this bill when we take into consideration the interests demanding it and the great amount of good that it will accomplish. This bill should pass, and receive, by reason of its merit, the same indorsement it received by the joint action of the two standing committees of this House that unanimously reported in favor of its passage, and in the brief time allowed me I will try to furnish a few reasons for the faith that is in me. And is it not true, Mr. Chairman, that governments like ours are instituted solely in the interest and for the benefit of the governed? Hence, is it not our duty as the law-making power to see that such laws are enacted as will do the greatest good to the greatest number? And is not a Republican form of government a government of the people, for the people, and by the people?

You may ask what has that to do with the passage of this bill that by its provisions creates another Cabinet officer. Listen and I will tell you. Is it not well known that our Government has three fundamental and distinctive branches, legislative, executive, and judicial? The first is the creative power; the second, the meditative, reflective, and sanctionary power; the third, the interpreting and enforcing power.

Now, no one will question the right of the agriculturist or laborer, if he be a citizen, to take a part in the legislative branch of our Government. Then should he not, per force of the same reason and right, have a voice and representation in the councils of the executive branch of the Government? I think he should.

As the law stands to-day we have seven Cabinet offices—the State Department, the Treasury Department, the War, the Navy, the Interior, the Post-Office, and the Law Department—and while we find the Agricultural Department independent, it has no voice in the executive branch of the Government.

Now, it can not be justly claimed that any of those Departments have as much interest in this Government, or those they represent, as the farmers, producers, and laboring people. Numerically the latter outnumber them tenfold.

Mr. Chairman, we all know that knowledge and theory is one thing, but that wisdom is only found in the practical walks of life. Hence, I draw a distinction between theory and practice. And while "law is a rule of action applied indiscriminately to all kinds of actions, whether animated or inanimated, rational or irrational," is it not wise and just that we have also a court of equity? And that court of equity tells you "that it will correct that wherein the law, by reason of its universality, is deficient." Hence, I say, if any one has constitutional doubts that this department of agriculture and iabor ought not to be created, should not justice and equity remove that doubt, and let that great body of our people, the largest numerically, the strongest financially, and, to my mind, the best morally, have a single voice in the executive branch of this Government?

And, Mr. Chairman, the statement is not made blindly, for an examination of the Census Report of 1880 will show 7,670,493 persons engaged in agriculture, 3,837,000 in manufacturing and mining, making a total of about 11,500,000 persons, while in all other professions and vocations in the walks of life a trifle less than 6,000,000 is the total, thereby showing that the laborers and producers of this country are numerically double all others. And is it not a fact that all the wealth, all the comforts and blessings of life, primarily come from the surface or out of the earth, and can be obtained only by labor? We find by the Census Report of 1880 that the farmers and agriculturists had $10,197,000,000 in round numbers invested; in mining and manufacturing, $2,790,000,000; making a total of $13,000,000,000. We also find on investigation, that, in 1880, 83 per cent. of all our exports were farm products; in 1881, 82½ per cent.; in 1882, 75 per cent.; in 1883, 77 per cent.; in 1884, 74 per cent., and in 1885, 73 per cent.

So you see, Mr. Chairman, this statement asserts mathematically that the honest farmer, "the noblest work of God," not only produces enough for himself and family, but enough to feed, nourish, and maintain his neighbors and friends, who are represented by other cabinet officers, and then to ship abroad to a foreign market three times as much as all other products and industries.

Then, I ask in the name of justice and right, are they not entitled to a voice in the executive councils and the calm deliberations of this Government? We think they are, and hence will support this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] withdraw his formal amendment?

Mr. MURPHY. I do.

Mr. HATCH. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill as amended to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5190) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture, had directed him to report back the same with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that it be passed as amended.

Mr. HATCH. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the amendments and on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments? [A pause.] If not, the Chair will put the question on the amendments in gross.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The question recurring on ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. BRAGG said: I call for the yeas and nays.

Several MEMBERS. Let us take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I withdraw the demand for the present.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HATCH. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The question recurring on the passage of the bill,

Mr. HATCH said: On this question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 226, nays 26, not voting 67; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. TOWNSHEND said: I am paired with my colleague, Mr. HENDERSON, but understanding he would vote for this bill, I have had my vote recorded in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. HATCH, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wish to announce that my colleague, Mr. TAULBEE, is detained from the House on account of sickness.

The following pairs were announced until further notice:

Mr. SENEY with Mr. JOHNSON, of New York.

Mr. FORNEY with Mr. LYMAN.

Mr. WINANS with Mr. BAYNE.

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. DUNHAM.

Mr. TAULBEE with Mr. PAYSON.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois.
Mr. REESE with Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska.
Mr. GLOVER with Mr. WARNER, of Missouri.
Mr. MITCHELL with Mr. WHITING.
Mr. WALLACE with Mr. RICE.
Mr. CANDLER with Mr. MILLARD.
Mr. STEWART, of Texas, with Mr. STEWART, of Vermont.
Mr. KING with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.
Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. GILFILLAN.
Mr. REAGAN with Mr. HISCOCK.
Mr. HOLMAN with Mr. CANNON.
Mr. CURTIN with Mr. NEGLEY, until January 12.
Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, with Mr. BUTTERWORTH, on this bill.
Mr. COX, of New York, with Mr. BURLEIGH.
Mr. DIBBLE with Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts.
Mr. BARRY with Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR.
Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. THOMPSON.
Mr. BELMONT with Mr. KELLEY.
Mr. RANDALL with Mr. JACKSON.
Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. GALLINGER.
Mr. WILLIS with Mr. WEST, on this vote.
Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey, with Mr. MOFFATT, on this vote.

Mr. THOMPSON voted "yea," but having been paired with Mr. ROBERTSON, withdrew his vote, stating that if not paired he would have voted "aye."

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. I wish to state that if I were not paired I would vote in the affirmative on this bill.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BARRY and Mr. SYMES ask leave of absence for this day, and if there be no objection it will be granted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of New York, was also granted leave of absence for ten days.

Mr. HATCH. I ask by unanimous consent that members desiring to do so may print remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BURROWS. I wish to state that my colleague, Mr. MOFFATT, is detained from the House by illness.

Mr. HATCH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I move to amend the title of the bill as follows:

After "agriculture" insert "and to create an executive department to be known as the department of agriculture and labor,"

Mr. HATCH. That is just what it does, and I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to, and as amended the title was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HATCH. Under the order of the House under which the consideration of the bill just closed was had, I ask the Speaker whether I am not entitled to the floor for the rest of the day.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman calls up any further measure it will be for the House to determine whether it will consider it or not.

Mr. HATCH. Then I call up the pleuro-pneumonia bill.

Mr. HERBERT. Am I not recognized?

The SPEAKER. The recognition of the gentleman from Alabama does not promote or prejudice the matter he has in view, because, if the gentleman from Missouri calls up the bill he has indicated the vote must first be taken upon it.

Mr. HATCH. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider that bill.

Mr. HERBERT. Am I not recognized?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized, but the gentleman from Missouri can also submit his motion.

Mr. HERBERT. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 7635) to consolidate certain bureaus of the Department of the Navy, and for other purposes.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, under the special order of the House I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 7208) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a bureau of animal industry, and for other purposes," approved May 29, 1884.

I wish to state to the House that the recent outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia at Chicago makes it a matter of imperative necessity that the House of Representatives should consider this bill and take prompt action upon it, because further delay is dangerous to this important industry of the country, and every hour adds to the danger.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. What is the bill?

Mr. HATCH. The pleuro-pneumonia bill.

Mr. SWINBURNE. Mr. Speaker, I trust the consideration of this bill will be postponed, at least for the present, and that it will be referred back to the committee. There never has been a hearing before the Committee on Agriculture as to this subject, and they are entirely ignorant of the facts with which the bill proposes to deal. The agricultural reports have been but recently received——

A MEMBER. What is the gentleman's statement?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. He states that the bill has not been considered by the committee.

Mr. SWINBURNE. And to-day the committee have no information whatever upon the subject.

Mr. HATCH. The statement of the gentleman from New York that this bill was not considered in the committee and passed, the gentleman knows, is misleading. The bill was considered and reported with not a single vote against it, and has been upon the Calendar since last April.

Mr. SWINBURNE. It was reported in May. At that time there was no report from the committee upon this subject.

Mr. HATCH. There was a report made by order of the committee, and signed by the chairman of the committee, and not one protest against it. Let the gentleman from New York state the case fairly and fully and I will take no issue with him; but I do not want the impression to prevail that this has not been considered by the committee.

Mr. SWINBURNE. The committee made a report, it is true, but I never saw it. I never read it.

Mr. HATCH. The reason is that the gentleman did not go to the document-room and get a copy and read it. It was printed within two days after it was made to the House by the committee.

Mr. SWINBURNE. Mr. Speaker, there are many things about this question which I would like the committee and the House to know before taking action upon it. There was a resolution for the purpose of getting these reports and other things published, that the House might know something of what has been done in this case, and what is expected to be done. I hope until that information is obtainable this will be permitted to go over.

Mr. HATCH. I insist upon my motion.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HATCH. My motion is that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the bill.

Mr. HERBERT. My motion was made prior to that. I desire to ask the Speaker if it was not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman's motion as preceding, but the order of the House under which the gentleman from Missouri calls up his measure takes precedence over the order under which the gentleman from Alabama calls up the bill to which he has referred.

Mr. HERBERT. If the motion of the gentleman from Missouri is voted down then mine comes up?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. SWINBURNE. If you will permit me, I will state that if this is again referred to the committee, within one week it can be reported with such information as may be attainable.

Mr. HATCH. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. SWINBURNE. But I want to tell the House the facts, if it will permit me.

Mr. HATCH. Regular order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HATCH, the House divided; and there were—ayes 90.

Mr. HERBERT. No further count is demanded.

So the motion was agreed to.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole to consider the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7208) to amend an act entitled "An act for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and for other purposes," approved May 29, 1884.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Chairman, I desire briefly to point out to the committee the changes proposed in this bill to the existing law upon this subject. The act establishing a bureau of animal industry was approved May 29, 1884. Members of the Forty-eighth Congress will remember the long discussion on that bill and all the points of interest it contained. That act, as far as it goes, is all right, but it does not go quite far enough. Experience has shown us that the present law is, unfortunately, inadequate to suppress the spread of pleuro-pneumonia in the United States.

I am not going to take up the time of this committee in attempting to emphasize the importance of this legislation. If there is a member on this floor who, up to this time, has not informed himself as to the magnitude of the interests involved, and of the violent and virulent character of this disease, and the millions of money it has cost this and other governments to keep it out of their herds of cattle, it will be impossible for me to do so if I took up the balance of my hour in the attempt.

It is the most dangerous disease to stock known in the history of the world. It has cost the governments of the world more money to control or extirpate pleuro-pneumonia than all other diseases to which cattle are subject. It has almost ruined Australia as a grazing and cattle-raising country. Holland wrestled with it for a hundred years. England has been persistingly fighting it with money and fire for the last century. And it is breaking out, now, here and there in the United States, and if not controlled by national legislation will in a short time destroy, absolutely destroy, the value of that cattle industry of this country.

The danger can not be overstated. The interests involved can not be computed. I have said before, and I repeat it because I believe it to be true, that the danger in dollars and cents to the tax-payers of the United States when the first gun at Fort Sumter ushered in the war of the rebellion, was not greater than the danger to be apprehended from this recent outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia among the cattle of the northwest. Estimate it if you please; it spreads all over the country from one end of it to the other; it affects every State and every county and every township in every State. It affects the interest of the entire sixty millions of people in this country who require meat for food. It affects our export demand; it affects the property interest of every single farmer in the land.

I know it will be stated on this floor by some gentlemen that they do not believe any such disease as pleuro-pneumonia exists, and they would not believe it if Providence were to take the dome off this Capitol and speak in thunder tones out of the clouds. They have simply made up their minds scientifically that there is no such disease, and they will not be convinced. I know nothing about this disease scientifically. I am not a physician; I have never studied it professionally; all I know about it is from the evidence produced in the room of the Committee on Agriculture in the past eight years, in the past four Congresses; the evidence of the nations of the world; the evidence of the best scientists in the United States on this subject; the evidence of the best practical cattlemen in the United States; the evidence that has been presented to all my senses.

I have seen the exposed lung of an animal that they said had died of pleuro-pneumonia. I only know from the statements of these scientists how it is communicated from one animal to another; and I know the fact exists, and every gentleman in this House knows it if he will believe human testimony. If any gentleman here will simply take the pains and the trouble to go back and read the history of the first outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia in the United States thirty-five years ago, in the State of Massachusetts, and see what that State did to stamp it out with fire and brimstone, burning it out, destroying the cattle and destroying the barns in which they had been housed, and thus getting rid of it, he will perceive that the history of this disease shows that it is only by such heroic treatment it can ever be mastered.

For eight years, from the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress I have been compelled by reason of my position upon the Committee on Agriculture to listen from time to time to the testimony in reference to this disease. This is in my judgment the gravest question that has been presented to the American Congress since I have been a member of it. With all the knowledge that we have to-day I think we know very little about it except that it is a dangerous disease that has now got a foothold in half-a-dozen or more States of this Union; and it is the duty of this House to take hold of it with serious determination to do whatever is necessary to assist in its extirpation.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HATCH. With pleasure.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I see the bill relates not only to pleuro-pneumonia, but that it relates to all diseases that are infectious, or diseases that can be communicated from one animal to another, and that the Commissioner of Agriculture may prescribe the means or methods of doing away with the disease or suppressing it. Is not that power too broad?

Mr. HATCH. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that that is the present law.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I was about to add that no doubt pleuro-pneumonia needs heroic treatment.

Mr. HATCH. If the gentleman from Ohio will read the bill through he will find the subsequent sections, which provide the machinery for this heroic treatment, do not apply to any other disease than that of pleuro-pneumonia, rinderpest, and foot-and-mouth disease. They are confined to those three diseases.

I will state further to the gentleman from Ohio that the first section of this bill repeals section 1 of the act of May 29, 1884, and inserts in lieu thereof the section which he will find in the bill. Now, the only change made in the requirements of this first section is to leave out the words in the act as it now exists, "not to exceed twenty persons at any any one time," so that it shall read:

And the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose.

In the original act we limited it to twenty persons at any one time, and the Commissioner from time to time has found himself so hampered under that provision of the law that it has been absolutely impossible to do anything with it. Why, sir, he can not put a proper quarantine force around this outbreak now in the city of Chicago with the force at his command. We remove restriction entirely and hold him responsible for the manner in which he expends the money under that provision of the bill. That is the only change in the first section of the bill. The gentleman from Ohio will observe that we have reported the entire section so as to avoid the method of legislation of simply moving to amend the section by striking something out of it. We have re-enacted the section, leaving out the words I have read in the original act—

Not to exceed twenty persons at any one time.

The second section of the bill is amended and contains the most important provision in it. That section gives the power to the Commissioner, with the co-operation of the State authorities and under State law, to condemn, appraise, and destroy diseased and infected cattle. That right does not exist under the present law. Under the present law he can only get possession of infected or diseased cattle by purchase or arrangement with the owner, and some of the States have absolutely prohibited the Commissioner or any of his officials from entering into their territory under this act to execute it. The provision made for that condition of things is in the portion of this section which gives to the President of the United States, in such cases, the power to place the State or any part of it in quarantine, and to hold it there until the State itself provides some means to extirpate the disease.

The only two important changes made are, first, to give the Commissioner the power to employ a force sufficient to execute the law without restriction as to the number required, and to give him the power under State law to condemn this private property for the public good, for the benefit of the entire country, without trespassing on the rights of the States in their local or police powers. He is to proceed, under the State law, to condemn this property and then to pay a certain valuation for it. Then, in addition to that, whenever a State refuses, or declines, or neglects to either co-operate with the Federal authorities under this act to control the disease within its borders, or to provide means under its own laws to control the disease, the President of the United States is authorized to declare that State, or any part of it, in quarantine and to enforce the quarantine.

Mr. LANHAM. In consequence of the existence of what diseases may that quarantine be ordered?

Mr. HATCH. Only the three diseases mentioned in the second section.

Mr. LANHAM. I call my friend's attention to line 76, which speaks of "a State or Territory in which a contagious or infectious disease exists." Now, is it the intention of the bill to limit this quarantine provision to rinderpest, pleuro-pneumonia, and the other disease named?

Mr. HATCH. It is. If the gentleman will read the first section of the bill, he will see that those are the only three diseases mentioned in that section to which this provision can be applicable.

Mr. LANHAM. I did not know what construction was placed by the committee upon that language, but it seemed to me rather broad.

Mr. HATCH. The language was adopted in the conference of which the gentleman himself was a member, as he will recollect.

Mr. LANHAM. I remember that; but the question is whether it is sufficiently definite and restricted.

Mr. HATCH. I have no question about it. That is the purpose of the bill, and there are no other contagious or communicable diseases included in it. Further, that is the construction which the officers have placed upon the law, so far as they have gone. Now, in addition to the amendments I have stated which are made by this bill in the existing law, there is a provision to appropriate a sum of money sufficient to meet this great emergency.

Mr. EDEN. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. HATCH. With pleasure.

Mr. EDEN. I notice that the bill provides that the value of this property shall be ascertained under the laws of the State providing for condemning private property for public use.

Mr. HATCH. I will say to the gentleman that when we come to that section I propose to move to strike out that provision in relation to the law for the condemnation of private property for public use and leave the section without that restriction.

Mr. EDEN. Then I will not ask my question.

Mr. HATCH. Now, Mr. Chairman, if members will read this bill carefully, it will be unnecessary for me to take up any additional time in explaining its objects. In conclusion, I will simply repeat that the only changes it makes in the law are, to remove the restriction as to the force to be employed, to give the commissioner authority to purchase and destroy diseased stock, and pay for them under State legislation, and to give the President of the United States power to enforce this act by quarantining any State, or portion of a State, which refuses to co-operate with the Federal authorities in the work.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will my friend permit a question?

Mr. HATCH. With pleasure.

Mr. McMILLIN. You state that one of the objects is to provide payment for the cattle destroyed. Is it not a fact that a cow afflicted with this disease, pleuro-pneumonia, is utterly worthless?

Mr. HATCH. Yes, and worse than worthless.

Mr. McMILLIN. Well, if an animal so afflicted is worse than worthless, why do your committee provide here for the payment out of the Treasury of the United States of the value of the animal, assessed before it was attacked by the disease? The clause of the bill to which I wish to call the gentleman's attention is the following, at the bottom of page 3:

Shall cause the same to be destroyed, and pay the owner not to exceed three-fourths of such amount as the appraisers may determine to have been the value before being diseased or exposed.

Now, if animals which have contracted this disease are, as the gentleman maintains, worse than worthless, I want to know why it is proposed to pay for such animals on the basis of their value before they were ever affected by the disease.

Mr. HATCH. I will take great pleasure in explaining to the gentleman the theory upon which that portion of the bill is based. The experience of the most enlightened governments of the world in the management of this disease for the last hundred years is that it is so easy for the owner of the animal to prevent the discovery of the disease and so hard to detect it if the owner is interested in concealing it, that you must make some provision of this kind for compensation; otherwise all the money you can appropriate will not suffice to destroy the disease. You must give some compensation even for the animal that is destroyed.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then you propose in this way to induce the owner of diseased stock to bring it in and sell it; and that is the object of the appropriation.

Mr. HATCH. Yes, sir; the object is to induce any man in the United States who owns a head of cattle affected with pleuro-pneumonia to give immediate notice to the Department, or some of its officers, so that the animal may be condemned and destroyed, and that the owner shall not be compelled to bear the whole burden of the loss.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But the trouble is, there is no loss, according to the gentleman's own statement.

Mr. HATCH. Well, the loss is not only to the owner of the animal; the loss is that which a single diseased animal may entail upon the cattle industries of this country.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But the destruction of a diseased animal is actually no loss to the owner.

Mr. HATCH. If the gentleman would take the pains to read page 1 of this report, he would find that the cattle of Australia were poisoned by the introduction of a single animal, which was carried there from England, and that the expenditure of $4,000,000,000 has not been able to eradicate the disease from that country.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have been hearing that here for years.

Mr. HATCH. Yes; and it is the truth. The trouble is that the truth does not get inside of the gentleman any further than his ears. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. The trouble is that my friend closes his ears to the truth when it starts towards him.

Mr. HATCH. So far as I am concerned, I believe that every animal that takes this disease is bound to die of it; that is my judgment. So far from such an animal being of any value, I believe it worse than valueless. I recollect that a gentleman from the State of Iowa, who formerly occupied a seat on this floor, and was a member of the committee of which I then had the honor to be chairman—I refer to Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, a Scotchman—said there was an old adage in Scotland which he had heard as long back as he could remember, that there was something worse than death from which a cow could suffer, and that was pleuro-pneumonia—worse than death, because it not only affects the animal itself, but may be communicated to all the stock in the stable or upon the farm where the diseased animal is kept.

Now, we have examined the legislative acts of England, Holland, and other countries, as well as of all the different States in this Union that have legislated on this subject. I believe we had before us the laws of more than twenty countries; and in no single instance did we find that the condemnation of this property was made by the Government without some compensation to the owner; and this provision for compensation has been regarded by these various legislative authorities as the wisest part of their enactments, because calculated to bring from their hiding places these cattle, when diseased. Talk about appropriating a quarter of a million dollars, or half a million dollars, or a million dollars, under this bill, for the protection of an industry which is vaster in its extent than any other single industry of the country, and which is absolutely threatened with destruction by reason of the encroachments of this disease!

The bill limits the amount which can be paid even for registered stock. Our committee consulted with gentlemen representing one or two of the largest cattle associations in the United States, consisting of practical stockmen; and they said it would be best to limit the sum of money to be paid under this bill even for a very valuable animal, so that there might be no extravagance about it. Every gentleman familiar with the history of different breeds of cattle in the United States knows that single animals have been sold at prices ranging from $1,000 to $15,000 apiece. Yet, under this bill, only $160 can be paid, in any case, for a pedigreed animal. I read from page 4 of the bill:

Provided further, That he shall not pay more than $160 for any animal with pedigree recorded or recordable in the recognized herd-books of the breed to which it may belong, nor more than $60 for an animal not pedigreed; and that in no case shall compensation be allowed for any animal slaughtered under the provisions of this act that may have contracted or have been exposed to such disease in a foreign country, nor shall compensation be allowed to the owner of an animal where by reasonable diligence he could have prevented his animals from becoming exposed.

I call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] specially to these provisions. If the cattle have contracted the disease through any fault of the owner, he can not be paid a cent. On the other hand, if the owner is simply the victim of misfortune—the general misfortune of the neglect of the Government to prevent the spread of the disease—then, under this bill, he may receive such compensation, not exceeding three-fourths of the value of the animal, as a commission may fix; but this compensation can, in no case, exceed $160 for a pedigreed animal and $60 for an animal not pedigreed.

Now I would be very glad to answer any inquiry of any gentleman further in regard to the provisions of this bill. [After a pause.] If there is no question which gentlemen desire to ask me I will yield the floor and reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SESSIONS. Before the gentleman from Missouri takes his seat I would like to inquire of him whether he can give a single instance of a case now in existence in the United States of pleuro-pneumonia, in any herd, in any county, in any State?

Mr. HATCH. Yes, sir. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. SWINBURNE] will return to me the last letter of the Commissioner of Agriculture I will answer that question. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SESSIONS] wants me to specify a single instance, giving the name of the owner of the herd, and in what county and State it is located. I will be glad to do so as soon as I obtain the letter which I gave to Dr. SWINBURNE. The gentleman from New York is a doubting Thomas, and he wants to put his finger in the hole of the wound made by this disease. I will give him an opportunity to do so in a moment. There are hundreds to-day of such cases.

Mr. DUNN. And there will be thousands if this bill becomes a law. [Laugter and applause.]

Mr. HATCH. There is no doubt about it. I will furnish the gentleman with a list of cases and all the necessary information to locate them. I have the last report of the Commissioner on the subject, but Dr. SWINBURNE has taken it out of the House with him, and I will have to wait until he returns. I yield the floor, reserving the remainder of my time.

Mr. MORGAN Mr. Chairman, there is not a member of this House who would more cheerfully vote for the amount in this bill, or ten times that amount, if necessary, than I, provided it would accomplish the extirpation of this dreaded disease of pleuro-pneumonia. But when this amount of money has been voted, will it have the effect to exterminate this disease? I disagree with my colleagues on the committee as to the value and efficacy of the remedy here sought. I do not disagree with them in any respect as to the necessity of destroying and stamping out the disease, but I do not agree with the committee, and I say that in my judgment this measure does not meet the issue now presented to the country. What is the scheme proposed by the pending bill? It is stated in the report of the majority:

It has been found by the investigations of the Bureau of Animal Industry that 455 herds are now known to be affected with this disease, comprising over 60,000 animals, of which over 1,700 individual animals are affected at this time, beside those that are exposed.

Then the paragraph concludes as follows:

Nothing but the destruction of all the affected and exposed animals will save the cattle industries of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a proposition laid down which is to be met by the passage of the bill and the execution of the law under it. It is nothing more nor less than the destruction of all affected and exposed cattle in the United States.

How many animals are unaffected, and how can you exactly reach this matter of the number of animals that are affected and that may have been exposed to infection? The committee says it has been found by investigations of the Bureau of Animal Industry that 455 herds are now known to be affected with this disease, comprising over 60,000 animals, of which over 1,700 individual animals are affected at this time, and the remainder of the 60,000 have been exposed to the disease.

The pending proposition appropriates the sum of $250,000 for the purchase and destruction of the animals affected and exposed to this disease. It is stated in the report that 60,000 are known to have been exposed, but, Mr. Chairman, how many have been exposed to this disease which are not known? And when you have purchased and slaughtered these 60,000, which are known, how can you say that another 60,000 will not be found requiring another appropriation for their purchase and slaughter?

In my judgment the provisions of this bill can not be of any value as a remedy for this disease. For the destruction of all the animals said to be affected by this disease the appropriation is only $250,000. The bill authorizes the purchase and slaughter, under certain conditions, of every one of these animals, allowing $120 for each, which is three-fourths of $160 fixed as the price of these animals.

Mr. HATCH. Let me correct the gentleman from Mississippi. The 16$0 is the sum provided for a registered animal, and does not apply to the whole of the 60,000 referred to in the report.

Mr. MORGAN. That is true; but the proof seemed to show that they were about all of the registered kind.

Now, there is another danger. When you come to investigate a matter of this kind why is it that the gentleman from Missouri proposes to pay three-quarters of $160 for each one of these animals already confessedly doomed to death? If it is not a registered animal in the recognized herd-books of the country, but an imported animal entitled to be registered, it does not come within the provisions of the bill; and although it may have come in contact with the disease itself, it is at liberty to go abroad throughout the country and spread the disease as long as it lives. You prohibit payment for that animal, and it can not be destroyed except by the consent of the owner, while being a foreign and blooded animal it is excluded from the bill all the way through. There is nothing to protect other cattle against it.

Such a clause casts suspicion on the bill; yet it is there. I do not wish to be understood as intimating that this bill would furnish a market for a surplus of "registered" cattle.

Mr. HATCH. Does not the gentleman know that we appropriate $30,000 annually in the regular agricultural appropriation bill to maintain quarantine stations for the inspection of every single animal that is imported into this country, for the protection of our own stock from contagion?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; I do know that, but the testimony of the very best authority is that this disease will lie dormant in the system, exhibiting no signs of its presence, and may break out even eighteen months after such inspection. Now, the quarantine laws fix but sixty or ninety days, and, after that, the animal, although it may be diseased, is permitted to go through the quarantine lines. I ask why is this animal permitted to go through the length and breadth of the land disseminating the disease, while domestic stock is to be destroyed? Ah! gentlemen, when you come to look at it—I will not say that it is an attempt in the interest of the herd-books, but it does look like this particular feature of it—it is not well calculated to prevent the spread of the disease. Here is a proposition involving a vast amount of money.

Sixty thousand head of cattle are supposed to have been contaminated, and at $120 a head it must be seen that it will run away up in the millions without taking into consideration the sixty thousand or more cattle which have also been contaminated or which are liable to be contaminated by the spread of the disease. Here is the sum of $250,000 appropriated to deal with the disease on the terms as stated in this report, and yet it must be evident that if the disease is as widespread as stated in the report $250,000 would be but a drop in the bucket, and might as well be thrown into the ocean at once for all the good it will do in the way of exterminating the disease. Just here, Mr. Chairman, is one of the infirmities pointed out by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], and it is manifest to anybody who will take the trouble to look at the bill.

Again, it is not free from bias. There are features in the bill that are liable to that criticism, because in the same clause there is a provision for three-fourths of $60 only for animals not recorded in the herd books of the country. What can it matter when it comes to the value of an animal whether it be registered or not? Is a "registered" ox that will weigh 2,000 pounds worth $160, and an "unregistered" one weighing the same worth only $60? What value does the mere registration give to it or what value could it have as weighed against the question of blood on the one side and good qualities and intrinsic value on the other. I do not say there is an attempt at an unjust discrimination, but it is in that direction, and the only point I make is that the bill does not reach the evils it is intended to remedy, and it is merely nonsense and a waste of money to attempt to deal with it in the manner proposed.

Let me call your attention to another more remarkable feature of the bill. The chairman of the committee has stated that in some of the States of the Union the Commissioner of Agriculture is prohibited from entering for the purpose of destroying the diseased animals, and he wishes, in cases of that kind, to have behind him the power of this great Government to enable him in his discretion to trample upon the sovereign powers of a State and declare it in quarantine.

Mr. HATCH. That is the province of the President.

Mr. MORGAN. Ah, yes. It is the province of the President to declare the quarantine, but it is done upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Agriculture. The Commissioner makes the recommendation, and the President "shall" declare the quarantine. If, then, originally it starts with the Commissioner, who has the power of doing it? I say that it is a dangerous power to place in any man's hands. Just think of it! What an enormous power it is! You put one man in such a position that he can exercise a power, at the instance of a combination of men, sufficient to go into the State of Illinois, or Missouri, or any other of the great States of this Union, and draw a cordon around it which will prohibit its stock from being shipped beyond its border, confining them within the limits of the State on the recommendation of the Commissioner by authority of the President of the United States.

In my judgment, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SWINBURNE], who has produced here a minority report, I believe, or if it is not a minority report it is a report upon another similar bill, sets forth the true remedy to be applied. He says that this disease among animals must be treated just as a similar disease should be treated in the human family, that you must quarantine against the disease, and that there is no valid excuse for the destruction of the animals to prevent the spread of the disease any more than there would be for destroying human life where there is an epidemic of cholera, yellow fever, or other kindred disease; and that if science can not reach it, in the present conditions of science, it is irremediable, because millions of money might be used in the destruction of stock, and yet year after year the disease be constantly reappearing, just as it did in Holland, although it is now said to be exterminated there; though, for my part, I would like to have full evidence of the extermination if it has been there, as alleged, hundreds of years, and is only recently "stamped out."

On this subject the gentleman from New York [Mr. SWINBURNE] has presented a report. He is a scientist, and, as I understand it, has been at the head of his profession, and served for years as the chief health officer of the city of New York. He has given attention to the subject, and I lay great stress upon the report he submits, not only on account of the character of the man who presented it, but of the intellectual worth which is found in it. He thinks that the remedy is not by destroying the diseased cattle any more than a remedy for the diseases heretofore named could be applied by destroying human life. He says that the remedies have not all been exhausted, and the proper method is to bring to bear the science of the country to meet the problem. It is a question, in his opinion, of scientific investigation; and, further, that reliance must be placed upon the States where they have the power to quarantine for such legislation as can be brought to bear upon the measure.

But I ask gentlemen to give this bill a little consideration in its details. I have marked some passages here to which I wish to call your attention.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would like to ask the gentleman a question right there.

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. You have investigated, I understand, this question, having made it a special study. I believe pleuro-pneumonia is the disease?

Mr. MORGAN. As a member of the committee I have thought over it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Is that disease of such a character that its presence is readily detected?

Mr. MORGAN. It is not. The testimony before the committee is that the disease may lie latent and concealed for eighteen months.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But when an animal becomes tainted with the disease, if I may use that expression, is its presence there readily detected?

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all. There may be an interval of three, or four, or five months before it is detected.

Mr. HATCH. Oh, no.

Mr. MORGAN. I put the question to the Commissioner of Agriculture why the disease was not kept out by quarantine. He said it might take twelve or eighteen months for the development of the disease after exposure to it.

Mr. HATCH. I am sure the gentleman from Mississippi wishes to state the matter correctly.

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly I do.

Mr. HATCH. Then I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he simply misapprehends the statement to which he has referred. Wherever an animal has been exposed to pleuro-pneumonia, within certainly sixty or ninety days, if the disease becomes developed in that animal at all, it will make its appearance. But sometimes an animal will have pleuro-pneumonia and partially recover, and the disease in the lung, as the physicians state it, is encysted, locked up, and it may go then for twelve or fifteen or even eighteen months before breaking out again. But it is dangerous all the time. The poison is there, locked up, and in that exists the necessity for destroying the animals that have been exposed to the disease.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, if an animal can carry this disease latent in its system for eighteen months, and there be 60,000 of these animals, to how many may not these 60,000 have communicated that disease, and can it be reached in this way?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Mississippi another question. Is it agreed that this disease is contagious?

Mr. MORGAN. I can not say that it is.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. What is the weight of the testimony upon that point?

Mr. MORGAN. It is said to be communicable. The gentleman perhaps can say whether that differs from being contagious.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If it be communicable from one animal to another the mere term used is not of much importance.

Mr. MORGAN. There are infectious diseases, contagious diseases, and communicable diseases; and this bill takes the whole tea-party in. [Laughter.] You must go to the doctors to have them settle the difference, whatever it is.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And they will be sure to disagree.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, they will disagree; and "when doctors disagree who will decide?" This is an important measure, and I desire the House to understand that I am not saying one word against anything that will meet the issue before us. If a measure can be presented by which it can be met at all, I am in favor of it. But what I do say is that this bill does not meet the issue, and that when you have passed this bill you will find that it is a vain and delusive thing and amounts to nothing.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Mississippi another question. How did this disease originate in the West? In imported cattle? Or did it spring up there?

Mr. MORGAN. A distinguished gentleman will take the floor after a while who can probably answer that question better than I can. I speak only as a member of Congress investigating the subject, and, for my part, am unable to determine whether this disease is self-producing in this country or anywhere.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The object of my question was to ascertain that.

Mr. MORGAN. I believe the testimony before us goes to show that where cattle are fed at distilleries where the grain after distillation is fed to them, the cattle fed on that kind of food may develop that disease.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Better clean out the Cincinnati distilleries, then.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Another question. What is the effect upon the flesh, as meat, of the animal which is diseased?

Mr. MORGAN. I am not able to tell you that, but I would not like very much to take a "steak" of it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I did not know whether the flesh of such animals is shipped to the market.

Mr. MORGAN. When the disease may lie latent in the system of the animal for twelve or eighteen months, it would be utterly impossible to prevent it going to the slaughter-house and its flesh coming to our tables.

Mr. HATCH. And still you do not want to do anything to prevent that.

Mr. MORGAN. I am willing to do everything in my power to prevent it, but this bill does not prevent it.

Mr. HATCH. Why, then, does the gentleman not offer something better?

Mr. MORGAN. Dr. SWINBURNE has a bill which comes nearer meeting my approval. He proposes to treat the matter from a scientific standpoint, as doctors treat diseases incident to the human family.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I should like to repeat the question I asked a little while ago, and which I do not remember was distinctly answered. That is whether the weight of the testimony is that this disease was carried into the West or that it generated there.

Mr. MORGAN. The weight of the testimony is that cattle that had been exposed when young had been transported West, and that from that time the disease had broken out. It was supposed to have been sent out by calves sold from Eastern cities.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And not to have been generated there?

Mr. MORGAN. And that it was not generated there. But that is mere supposition, of which there is no proof. The trouble as now encountered is want of knowledge and information on the subject. I have spoken to you as a layman, and I will now turn you over to Dr. SWINBURNE, who is an approved expert in all matters of this kind incident to the human family.

Mr. SWINBURNE. Mr. Chairman, knowing that our committee and that this House could get no authentic information on this subject unless something was published expressly for the purpose of giving it, I took the liberty of presenting to the House an adverse report. I, personally, had over 5,000 copies of that report printed and distributed throughout the country, hoping that it would, at least, set people thinking and prevent them from taking everything upon hearsay as it comes from the bureau of animal industry.

Probably there are gentlemen present who remember the fact that the agricultural report was not printed or received last year until the closing hours of the session, so that we were unable to get any information of what was being said or done there on this subject. Early in March the chairman of our committee made a report which he says was read to the committee, though I was not aware of it. I never heard the report and never saw it until ex-Commissioner Loring asked me: "What do you think of Mr. Hatch's report?" I said, "I have not seen it." He said, "I wish you would look at it." I said, "I will," and I did so. I looked over the report very carefully, and found that the chairman had there stated that there were 60,000 head of cattle that had been exposed to pleuro-pneumonia, and, in addition, that there were over 17,000 then sick.

I wish the committee to bear in mind in this connection that we did not receive the agricultural report until near the close of the last session. Soon after that I offered a resolution upon the subject, but it never passed the House. For some reason, which I do not know, I was unable to get the chairman to call it up. When a resolution was adopted and sent to the Agricultural Department asking about these 60,000 head of cattle, the answer returned was that they did not know anything about them, and had never made any such statement. I asked the chairman of the committee [Mr. HATCH] at the time his report was brought to my attention, what was his authority for that statement, and he said he received it from Mr. Salmon. I said, "That is not an official report;" and he conceded that. When the Commissioner of Agriculture answered our resolution he said that he never stated that there were 60,000, or any such number, exposed to pleuro-pneumonia, and he entirely failed to give us any information on the subject.

Mr. HATCH. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. SWINBURNE] have the kindness to quote from the report, which shows that the letter is there, signed by Mr. Salmon?

Mr. SWINBURNE. I concede that. Nobody disputes that.

Mr. HATCH. But the statement you make would go to show that I had embodied in my report a statement that was not given to me, whereas I have printed the letter verbatim.

Mr. SWINBURNE. I would say to the committee that Mr. HATCH stated at the time that he had all these facts from Mr. Salmon, and that he so stated in the report.

Mr. HATCH. Is not the letter signed by Mr. Salmon?

Mr. SWINBURNE. Certainly it is. Nobody has any doubt about that. But the point is this: Our chairman made a report upon the basis of a letter that had no official authority and conveyed no official information. We were unable at that time to see the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture. We sent to the Department and to the Printing Office several times to get it, but were unable to do so. That was why I did not make my adverse report until some months afterward, and then I made it from an unbound copy of the report and the accompanying documents.

In that report and in the succeeding one, large numbers of cattle were stated to be sick in the cities of New York and Brooklyn. New York we all know is a Democratic city, and the board of health is Democratic, but they denied in toto the assertions made by the Agricultural Department on this subject; and now, when we get the latest report from the Department, what does it say? It only gives a few cases of the disease in New Jersey and in Maryland.

Mr. CUTCHEON. What is the total number that they report diseased?

Mr. SWINBURNE. I do not remember exactly; five hundred or six hundred.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. They do not refer to Chicago at all?

Mr. SWINBURNE. Yes; they do. They say that of the Chicago cattle they killed between two thousand and three thousand, of which a little over one thousand were sick and the rest well, and as to those that were sick, they do not say that the disease was pleuro-pneumonia. They do not say what it was.

Now, if the committee will permit, I will present the report which I made in reply to the one based on this information received from Mr. Salmon, and will have it printed in the RECORD to-morrow.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The views of the minority may be read in the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SWINBURNE.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SWINBURNE, from the Committee on Agriculture, submitted the following as the views of the minority, to accompany bill H. R. 8843:

The undersigned, believing that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture was imposed upon in the representations made to him by the chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, upon which he founded his report, submitted to this House on March 23, and believing that if the recommendations made in the report are carried out a large amount of money will be uselessly expended, a dangerous power invested in incompetent men, and great injustice inflicted on the raisers of cattle in this country, we submit the following report to accompany House bill 8843, as a substitute for House bill 3350:

The bureau of animal industry was established under an act entitled "An act for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals," approved May 9, 1884.

By the provisions of the creative act the bureau was to be in charge of a chief "who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon," appointed by the Commissioner of Agriculture, and who was to "investigate and report upon the condition of domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases among them and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country." The act further provided that a full and detailed report of the bureau should be presented annually to Congress at the "commencement of each session."

To carry out the provisions of that act, $250,000 have been appropriated by the Government during the last two years; only about $100,000 have been expended; not a large sum, it is true, if the objects were attained and the great interests of cattle raising benefited. But such has not been the fact. No knowledge of the disease so-called pleuro-pneumonia has been discovered further than what has been known for hundreds of years in Europe, to wit, "that the disease has scarcely spread at all except by the movement of cattle," and that practically it existed in France "for thirty years without making any important progress," but was spread, according to the first report of the bureau of animal industry, because of the necessity to drive herds of cattle to supply the armies under the great Napoleon.

None of the requirements of the law have been complied with, even to the rendering of a report at the commencement of the session, and, notwithstanding the fact that no advance has been made either in means for the protection of the farmer or in giving any scientific knowledge as to the origin of the disease or the means to eradicate it, a further appropriation of $350,000 is asked by the bill. Both the original bill and the substitute offered by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture re-enact the powers of the Commissioner of Agriculture, and extend them so that wherever, in the opinion of the Commissioner, it is deemed advisable, he may appraise and slaughter the diseased and exposed cattle and compensate the owners, by the original bill at four-fifths their value, and by the substitute of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture at three-fourths.

The forthcoming report of the chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry will clearly exhibit the dangerous predicament in which the Government will place itself by such a barbarous and unjust mode of procedure. The chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry states that at the time of closing his report 455 herds, comprising over 60,000 animals, were exposed to the disease termed pleuro-pneumonia. His report states that experience places the average of animals which will be severely affected at less than 30 per cent., and that the average of these which die from the disease is one-third. By the investing of this power of slaughtering in the bureau if but 25 per cent. were affected, and one-third of these were to be slaughtered, each animal at a valuation of $75 (the chief's estimate), the amount of money to be paid at two-thirds the valuation would be over $250,000. But as 15,000 out of the 60,000 are infected, there could be no discrimination, and all must be slaughtered at an expense of nearly $750,000, a rather costly luxury for the Government to indulge in to the injury of the raisers of fine stock for the purpose of offering a market to speculators and traders.

The whole argument of the chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry is an effort to convince the nation, and particularly Congress, to whom he appeals for an appropriation, that there is but one remedy, and that is the total extirpation of the disease by slaughter. According to his theorizing there is no method of knowing what cattle are infected, as the disease may not develop itself for months, and as a result every one of the 60,000 exposed must be slaughtered, at a cost to the Government of not less than $3,000,000, at $50 each. That Congress is prepared to accept the suggestions to be evolved out of the mass of contradictions to be submitted by the chief "as his report" cannot be entertained. According to his own showing, only one-third of the 30 per cent. of infected cattle die, the remaining two-thirds of the sick recover. According to their own report, throughout Europe, and particularly in the sections where the contagion is less virulent, the average of cattle which die from the disease is less than 40 per cent. of the infected.

In Austria, out of 114,757 head of cattle exposed to the disease, only 6,614 died. In Prussia, of 10,154 head exposed but 1,856 died; while in Saxony, of 505 head exposed only 88 died. In Holland, where the disease was attempted to be crushed out by wholesale slaughter, an experiment revealed that only 202 were found infected out of 3,050 head which had been exposed and were slaughtered. And yet, in the face of these facts, the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry asks $350,000 to enable him to carry on the Government slaughter-house. If such a system is to be adopted, we would recommend the changing of the name of the Department from that of Bureau of Animal Industry to bureau of butchery for the destruction of the domestic animals of the United States, to be in charge of a corps of butcher boys, who would be as well qualified for the positions as the present head of the bureau seems competent for his.

In this recommendation the chief advocates the very absurd proposition that a liberal indemnity should be paid owners of cattle to report cases of sickness, where a small indemnity leads to secreted disease. A new feature in public ethics, which requires a premium to be paid men to prevent violations of law.

It is held by the chief of the bureau that animals infected still have a certain value, and that to take them by the right of eminent domain and slaughter them would be unjust and foreign to the wishes of the stockmen of the country, and unjust where they are often the entire dependence for the support of a family. There can be no question that the slaughtering of these animals would be a great injustice. They are of a breed which the owners desire to preserve and not to butcher.

In every instance reported by the bureau this disease is only found to break out among valuable imported herds of Jerseys, which the owners have been at great expense to import and improve, and which, at a money valuation, could not be disposed of at double the amount estimated as damages. The destructive effect of this disease is reported to be principally among cows, and, if it be true, as the chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry says, that the disease lays latent for months before discovery, it is evident to save the people from poisoned milk that the Department should be in charge of a man who might be able to devise methods to save instead of destroy.

Aside from the legal question arising, as a matter of equity, it would be equally logical to ask the Government to appropriate funds to reimburse farmers for the loss of their stocks by cyclones, birds, rot, or any other unforeseen cause, because such crops were the dependence of a family. There are others interested in the protection of cattle from disease besides the stockmen—the consumers, consisting of the public at large—and to protect these from diseased meats and impure milk the Government of the United States should, with the co-operation of the authorities of the States, enforce stringent laws to govern herds in pastures and stables and to compel the observance of proper sanitary laws, which would prove more effective than any other means suggested. These laws, extending to the slaughter-houses or shambles, would prevent impure meats from being placed on the market. Such a system would compel owners to greater vigilance in their own interests rather than to encourage negligence, a result to be expected if the Government were to become the purchaser of diseased cattle which had become valueless and beyond cure.

It is asserted in the report that contagious pleuro-pneumonia prevailed in the vicinity of New York city and Brooklyn and in parts of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, District of Columbia, and Virginia, and "from the facts given that there is no reason to expect any aid in the extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia from either medical treatment or inoculation." How far intelligent legislation should be based on this report may be inferred from the fact that when, on the strength of this report, a request was made to have one of these cases in the District of Columbia shown, the reply was, "We know of none now in the District, but will try and find one." The health department of New York city says "it has no knowledge of the presence of contagious diseases or what is termed pleuro-pneumonia among cattle."

The commissioner of health of the city of Brooklyn, in a letter dated May 4, 1886, says:

"Examinations are made by officers under the authority of the State board of health, who are also inspectors in this department. Management of cases of pleuro-pneumonia: Strict quarantine, isolating the diseased from the healthy. Treatment: Inoculation and the destruction of those deemed incurable. Conclusions: Although not strictly founded on actual statistics, that in pleuro-pneumonia for several years there was 25 to 30 per cent. is now reduced to about 5. Thus the gain of 20 to 25 per cent. less of pleuro-pneumonia, although fairly attributed to the more intelligent management and the inoculation combined, may be counted as a logical sequence of the better hygiene and improved methods, does not establish the fact as absolutely incontrovertible. For the past seven years the practice of inoculation in pleuro-pneumonia has obtained. With but few exceptions the results have been satisfactory, the present number of horned cattle being 1,850 as against 2,550 in former years. This must be admitted as a factor in drawing conclusions, the former conditions being one, no doubt, of overcrowding in many instances.

Here are positive and distinct contradictions of the report, elicited after the report of the chief of the bureau was made public by advance sheets to the Committee on Agriculture, first, that contagious disease does not exist among cattle in the District of Columbia, nor in nor around the city of New York, and that in the city of Brooklyn it has been reduced from 25 to 30 per cent. down to 5 per cent. by strict quarantine, inoculation, and the destruction of the incurable.

The argument is advanced by the chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry that the publication of the existence of contagious disease in dairy herds, so long as it is known that no measures are adopted for its suppression, destroys the legitimate business of these herds, and is such an intolerable hardship to such owners that they would not submit to it for any great length of time, therefore the idea of a quarantine at State lines is impracticable, and will fail to accomplish the desired object. The freedom of commerce is a matter of too great importance, he says, to be interfered with, except in the cases of the most urgent necessity.

The remedy suggested is to stamp out contagion by slaughter of all the exposed animals, because it does away at once with the necessity of placing restrictions upon commerce, and "because it is the most economical means of controlling diseases." To us this line of reasoning is simply absurd, and might with equal force be applied to anarchists, dynamiters, or any other lawless men whose business may be destroyed by law, and who, considering law an intolerable hardship, might conclude "that they would not submit for any great length of time." These are strange reasons upon which to predicate conclusions that the Government should spend a large amount of money. The greater consideration than that of commerce, the dangerous results to consumers of infected meats, or by milk from infected cows, on the consumer, has apparently no effect with the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry. He seems to hold that they have no rights.

Looked at from a national point of view, however, it is desirable, says the report, to have the plague exterminated at once. Not only is our enormous investments of $1,200,000,000 in cattle menaced, but we have now in our national commerce, foreign and domestic, restrictions which cost us every year several times as much as would be required to exterminate the disease once and forever.

The fallacy of this line of reasoning, devoid of all scientific knowledge, is only equaled by the presumption of the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry in his attempting to criticise the medical profession when he says, in answer to his own question, "How can this danger be removed?:"

"When we are called upon to deal with a grave problem like this we naturally inquire what methods have been settled upon as most efficient by others who have had experience in similar emergencies. With twelve hundred millions of property at stake it would be inexcusable rashness to adopt a course of procedure which had been tested in many other countries and had failed in all. It is not a case where theorizing is admissible, but our course should be guided by the irresistible logic of facts and experience. Doubtless it would be a grand thing if we could pour a few doses of some potent medicine into the body of an affected animal and utterly destroy the contagious principle which is coursing through its veins and is multiplying itself in the innermost recesses of the animal organism. But such a medicine has not yet been discovered, and probably never will be, for the simple reason that the germs of such contagious diseases have been found to be of a vegetable nature and have more powers of resistance than the living matter of the animal body. And so, long before the virus could be destroyed, the animal itself must of necessity perish.

"To combat the contagious diseases of mankind the medical profession is equally at a loss for remedies which have any decided effect upon the period of their duration. The patient is eased when in pain, stimulated when sinking, receives such care as tends to prevent complications, but the essential disease is allowed to run its course. To prevent the spread of such contagion the sanitarian imposes quarantine restrictions and isolation from susceptible people; but how often he fails to prevent the spread of such diseases is shown by the simple fact that we lose in this country every year more than ninety thousand human lives from maladies which only arise by contagion, and if we add those which often, if not always, are contracted in this way we should have a grand total of two hundred and thirty thousand.

"Isolation and quarantine is also applicable to contagious animal diseases; but, as in the case of those affecting mankind, it is an inefficient and expensive remedy, which may hold a plague in check for a time but seldom eradicates it. We have a simpler, less expensive, speedier, and in every way more efficient remedy in the destruction of every diseased animal."

Every learned physician has become thoroughly convinced that all blood diseases will run their course and that the victim will either die or recover after a certain point is reached, and that it is not drugs but sanitary measures which prove the remedial agencies, and that unless the physician believed in and followed the traditional and barbarous teachings of the dark and ignorant days of the profession he would never think of its being "a grand thing if we could pour a few doses of some potent medicine into the body." The medical profession has not devoted its time to horse-doctoring or study of animal diseases, yet all the knowledge of these so far acquired has been discovered by the regular medical profession.

In their legitimate line, the treatment of disease in the human family, they have learned the nature of all (nearly thirty) the known blood poisons to which humanity is heir and how to control as well as prevent their spread. They have demonstrated that they can check and eradicate the most virulent, such as cholera, yellow and ship fevers, and small-pox. This was clearly shown when, in 1866, 18 vessels, mostly steamships, arrived in the port of New York from foreign ports with 8,501 passengers and crews aboard who had been exposed to cholera during the passage. On 5 of these vessels there were 3,133 steerage passengers, and of this number but 243 cases, or 7¾ per cent., proved fatal in quarantine. On one of the vessels, the Virginia, with 985 steerage passengers, there were 78 deaths, or 7⅞ per cent., while on board her twin sister vessel, the England, which put into Halifax, out of 1,145 steerage passengers there were 214 deaths, or 18¼ per cent.

Of the latter vessel there are strangely conflicting accounts; the health officer at Halifax reported that 400 cases were sent to the hospital-ship. As the passengers were all destined to New York, and trace could afterwards be found of but 9, the deductions are that the remaining 391 died in hospital. From infected bedding thrown overboad from the England and picked up by children on the beach, the contagion was conveyed into several families in the city; the pilot who took the vessel into port died of the disease, as did also his two children, and one of the men employed in cleaning the vessel was taken with the disease and died in a few hours.

The superiority of the principle of quarantining as pursued in the port of New York over that pursued in Halifax, in separating the sick from the healthy, and the observance of sanitary laws, was proven in the fact that not one of the officials or employés at the New York quarantine was infected in any way with the disease, and that not a case of cholera was known to have occurred in the city of New York. In 1867 there arrived at the New York quarantine 152 vessels from ports infected with yellow fever and small-pox, on which there were 1,030 cases, of which 384 proved fatal. On 28 of these vessels there was small-pox, to which 16,680 persons had been exposed. Between the years 1864 and 1868, inclusive, 147 vessels arrived on which there was small-pox, to which 73,541 persons were exposed, and yet, during all these years, not more than half a dozen cases of sickness could be traced beyond the boundaries of the quarantine as coming from the quarantine, and not a single case of sickness occurred among the officials or employés at that station.

The preventives enforced were a safe and well-guarded quarantine, and a system of disinfecting, and a strict regard to the laws of nature. Science, when threatened with these diseases, did not resort to the cowardly methods of ignorance and quackery and seek safety by having their victims cover up the ignorance of the profession in the grave. True science realizes that all laws governing the health and condition of men and animals are founded on the laws of God, and believe that the only treatment of this disease in cattle is to be found in a well regulated quarantine, where the sick and infected animals are kept in distinct and separate quarantine, with proper nourishment and care. Every consideration of humanity and science protests against the Government unnecessarily clothing any commission with power to destroy the lives of any animals whom God has given to man for the sustaining of his life and strength, except for that purpose.

The experience learned during these years in the treatment of the four most virulent diseases—small-pox, cholera, yellow and ship fevers—enabled the physicians, by their analyzing the diseases, to know that each had a peculiar mode of propagation, and that by understanding the laws of nature they could control much of the infection. Of yellow fever they discovered that it was not personally contagious, and was spread through soiled and contaminated clothing, and that it becomes virulent and is carried from one locality to another through ships and spread through drains and foul places where the pabulum is sufficient for its growth and extension. Ship fever, they learned, has its origin generated in unhealthy and improperly ventilated places, bad food, filth, and animal excretions, and that its treatment is simply a dependence on sanitary laws.

Cholera, they learned, came from the Eastern country, and was due to excessive heat, filth, moisture, and bad water, and originated among the poorer or laboring classes, who through their poverty were compelled to live in poorly constructed and miserably ventilated houses, and who were forced to subsist on poor and insufficient food, and that it was extended through fecal matter, and that the only means by which it could be checked was removal from the surroundings which produced the disease, cleanliness, and good food and nourishment and pure air. Small-pox, the most virulent of all the four, they found was personally contagious and was spread by being carried short distances in the atmosphere and by clothing saturated with the poison, and that the only proper treatment was good sanitary arrangements and plenty of good cool air, and that it was in no way controlled by medicines.

It is possible the same knowledge can be learned of the diseases in cattle. It is generally accepted now that Texas fever originates in exhalation from the soil, and by the investigations in New York State, in 1869, it was settled that the disease could be carried and spread by cattle without their manifesting any indications of disease, and that cattle taken to Texas would die of the disease, while native cattle seemed to enjoy an immunity from the disease.

It is generally conceded, and by the bureau, that up to this time no person has, either by practical treatment of cattle or by scientific observation and experiment, discovered when this disease first becomes contagious and first ceases to become contagious, or how it is imparted one to another, and for this very reason the principle of a strict quarantine and the slaughtering of the herds stand on equally strong grounds of reasoning, with this exception, that by quarantining at least 75 per cent. of the infected bovines recover, thus saving to the Government, as suggested in the report, $3,000,000 annually, and to the owners, in many instances, cattle they prize beyond money for breeding purposes, and also prevent the slaughtering of inferior stock for which the Government is asked to reimburse.

When yellow fever, small-pox, cholera, or any other blood poison (excepting those induced by the bites of animals or the poisons of plants) was found to have broken out in the land, or was being imported from other nations, had the boards of health throughout the country recommended the slaughtering of the infected for the purpose of stamping out the disease they would have been pronounced as ignorant and barbarous, and yet that course would have been as intelligent as the method recommended by the Bureau of Animal Industry for the suppression of contagious disease among cattle.

Says the chief, in his report:

"The diseased portion of the lungs remains diseased; it loses all life, becomes encysted, breaks down into pus, and retains the virulent contagion for an indefinite period, and the animals which possess such lungs are frequently the most dangerous of any. They may appear in perfect health to the casual observer, or to the best judge of cattle, and yet they scatter the contagion and infect all susceptible cattle with which they come into contact."

This is a scientific assertion, and, if proven, one of great value in leading to light in the manner of protection and treatment. Any student of medical science might make the same assertion, as all are taught these are possible conditions under certain circumstances, and if they be true in this case it is very important the public should know why they are true and upon what facts and line of reasoning they are true. No scientific assertion is to be accepted unless proven, and this is not, nor can it be, by post mortems over the carcasses of animals which die of disease. To establish this as a fact can only be accomplished by a careful scrutiny and examination in all stages of the disease, as well as of the healthy, and by post mortems, and by exposing the healthy to the sick in every stage of the disease as experimental tests, thus ascertaining whether or no the well become infected by such exposure. Other knowledge is requisite of which we are yet in the dark, and more especially the important point why it is that the Jerseys or other imported stock are particularly susceptible to this disease. If this can be learned it may be discovered that in the methods of caring for these valuable breeds the remedy may be found.

To arrive at these results there is no possible method but by quarantine. The idea of slaughtering is a remedy devised in foreign lands, and among other extensive quotations in the report is given extracts from the laws of England as far back as 1869. Yet we find in all the countries where they have the slaughtering law the contagion still breaks out with serious results. By our quarantining of sick persons with contagious diseases and the isolating of the sick from the healthy we have proven our superiority over the European nations in that matter, and to adopt their unsuccessful methods in the treatment of disease in cattle will be a scientific step backward, and exhibit as profound ignorance as is shown by the surgeon who thinks no process correct unless he finds it in the books of practice given by some foreign author and practiced by a dignitary in his profession and who rushes with knife in hand to maim and cripple by amputation for every break or wound, simply because he was too lazy or stupid to study for himself. To pursue this very course Congress is asked by the bureau to extend its powers so that the Commissioner of Agriculture may not be limited in the number of employés and have power in his discretion to slaughter at will, and to enable him to do this $350,000 is asked.

We honestly object to this power being vested in the Commissioner much more than we do to the granting of the amount asked, although we believe the amount far in excess of what is necessary to attain present relief as well as practical scientific results which will throw light on a subject now wrapped in mystery, and of which the Bureau of Animal Industry is absolutely ignorant. We do not charge any desire to enter into any criminal bargain or arrangement, but are satisfied that for some reason this matter of disease among cattle has been incompetently managed, and we can see no plausible reason why a strict quarantine of infected and suspected infected herds can not be efficiently carried out, and by scientific examinations and post mortems the same knowledge acquired as has been in the treatment of contagious blood diseases among human beings. By this system of quarantining science was enabled to study the contagion of cholera, learn the manner of its propagation, as well as means for preventing the spread. During the prevalence of one of the blood poisonings in animals, in 1869, it was discovered, and by scientific men generally accepted, that the disease was extended just as cholera is extended, by the excretions and not by atmospheric means.

Further than this the experience of the last two years by the Bureau of Animal Industry has developed nothing. It is essential that for the better protection of commerce, and to avert the annual visitations of these diseases and the destruction of the cattle therefrom, that a more thorough examination be made, and that the authorities of the States be invited by the Commissioner of Agriculture to co-operate with the General Government in preventing the spread of disease and protecting the people from the evils resulting from the use of poisoned meats and milk. To effect this desired end, in the interests of humanity and trade, it is desirable that proper men should have this great work committed to them, so that out of the multitude of conflicting views some truths might be evolved. We protest against the expenditure of money through incompetent channels.

From the confused mass of speculations in the report of the chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, advance copies of which have recently been furnished the Committee on Agriculture, and which by law should have been published at the commencement of the session, the only facts we can glean are that the Department has been floundering around in ignorance among a mass of theories and speculations; that no investigations have been made other than the lungs to find whether the poisonous explosions ever occur in any other part or organ of the animal, or to define whether the disease was that of blood poisoning or inflammation. Having accepted the theory of pleuro or inflammatory this was all that seemed necessary, when, in truth, the disease is not inflammatory.

One of the deductions that the animals were infected only in one lung, and that that lung would become encysted, would explode the theory of contagion, as an encysted part can not throw off contagion. The chief the bureau complains that members of the medical profession were responsible for deceiving the public in regard to their ability to detect this disease, but hopes this species of quackery will in time disappear, and asserts that the examinations made by the stockmen were worse than useless. He believes that the only safe way is for an experienced veterinarian to carefully examine the lungs of every animal by oscultation and percussion. Yet, according to his own statement, one of his experienced veterinarians issued a certificate at Cynthiana, Ky., that a herd was "very healthy, in a thriving condition, and altogether free from disease, contagious or otherwise."

Of one hundred and twenty-four of this herd shipped to Austin, Tex., only seventy-two remained alive. Several post mortems were made by an experienced veterinarian of a number which died, and his report was that "in none by these did he find evidences of pleuro-pneumonia." Of this herd the chief of the bureau says that when he was in Austin on official business to inquire into the condition of cattle there, he was reliably informed that the carcasses of three animals could be seen on a farm not far from where he was, and that two or three were lying on the lot too sick to stand; but asserts that he did not have sufficient authority to make an investigation. By the reports then made there were conflicting opinions among the veterinarians as to the condition, and yet it seems that the head of the bureau was incapable of giving any decision in the matter, and when asked if he would, in the event of the cattle being found in good health, give a certificate, satisfied himself with the remark that he was not there to give certificates.

We are firm in the conviction that this disease termed pleuro-pneumonia is a blood poison, originating among cattle in stables and stock-yards, and we agree with the opinion of ex-Commissioner of Agriculture Loring that it can be checked by quarantining in open, well-protected fields, and that until stringent laws are enforced to protect cattle in the stables and stock-yards, and in transportation, and for providing them with proper food and water, the disease can not be extirpated and the public protected from diseased meats and the poisonous milk of infected cows. We are of the opinion that the disease is not increasing, but rather diminishing, as in New York and Brooklyn, where stringent sanitary laws are enforced and frequent inspections made. Believing that the theory of inoculation has failed to produce the desired results, and that the slaughtering, as a means to extirpate, is cowardly and unwise, we are opposed to the appropriation asked by the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry to be expended as he recommends in his report.

Seventy-nine pages of the report are devoted to this herd from Cynthiana, Ky., and another in Calloway, Mo., which were sick in the latter portions of 1884 and the first months of 1885. Nothing is to be found in the forthcoming report which gives any particular touching any of the 455 herds reported to be exposed at the time of the making of the report. Nothing is said to indicate where they are, except in general terms; and what is there asserted, that the disease prevails to any extent, is contradicted by the reports from the departments of health of the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and in the report of the statistician published from the Department of Agriculture for April last.

According to this report of the statistician, the condition of cattle is shown to be good, and that for the previous year losses from all causes did not rise above 2 per cent. in any of the New England or Middle States, in any of the States between the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, or in Minnesota or Iowa; while in no Southern State, except Florida, did the losses reach 8 per cent. The statistician reports no instances where pleuro-pneumonia exists except a few cases "supposed to be pleuro-pneumonia" in Scott County, Iowa, and cases "also reported under the same name from Contra Costa County, California." Evidently this expert official does not see in figures, which are supposed to be "stubborn facts," the great havoc the imagination of the chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry haunts his dreams with.

JOHN SWINBURNE.

Mr. SWINBURNE. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a bill on this subject, which, at a suitable time, I shall offer as a substitute for the one now pending.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly. The proposed substitute is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That to better promote the raising of and trade in live-stock, and for the better prevention of the spreading of disease among cattle, the act establishing a Bureau of Animal Industry, approved May 29, 1884, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

Repeal section 1, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his Department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief thereof, who shall be an acknowledged competent physician and surgeon and anatomist, and who shall have had at least five years' experience in one or more of the health departments of the States or Territories, and whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the contagious diseases among the domestic animals of the United States; the causes of disease and the manner and mode of the propagation of contagious infectious, and communicable diseases among them; the length of time of the inoculation of contagious diseases among cattle; the period of existence of the disease in the acute stage and in the chronic stage, and whether the disease is contagious in either of these conditions, and if so, when and in what manner. He shall further report what means have been adopted to prevent the spread of the infection, and the remedies used to cure, and the results. It shall be his duty to collect all information on the subject as shall be valuable to the scientific, agricultural, and commercial interests of the country."

Repeal section 2 of said act, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The salary of the chief of said bureau of animal industry shall be $5,000 per annum, and the Commissioner of Agriculture shall appoint a clerk for said bureau, with a salary of $1,500 per annum. That the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a sufficient force for the purpose of this act, not to exceed five at any one time in any one State, Territory, or District, such assistants or agents to be citizens of the State, Territory, or District to which they may be assigned to duty, and who shall be practical physicians, veterinary surgeons, or stock-raisers. The compensation of such agents or employés shall be at the rate of not less than $5 nor more than $10 per diem, with all necessary expenses, while engaged in the actual performance of their duties under the provisions of this act."

Repeal section 3 of said act and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act. Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist, or such State or Territory shall have adopted plans and methods for the suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and such plans and methods shall be accepted by the Commissioner of Agriculture, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify his or their readiness to co-operate for the extinction by quarantine of any infectious, contagious, or communicable disease among cattle, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, and in disinfection, and in the enforcing of such quarantine measures as the chief of the bureau of animal industry may deem necessary to prevent the spread of disease from one State or Territory into another: Provided, That the expense of caring for and feeding of such quarantined cattle shall be paid by the owners of such cattle. That all expenses by the Government in the carrying out of this act shall be incurred only on the authority and by the approval of the chief of the bureau of animal industry: Provided, That whenever a State or Territory in any section of which a contagious or infectious disease exists, which the chief of the bureau of animal industry has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation, fails to make proper provision for its quarantine or to co-operate with the the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prevent the spread of the disease by a strict quarantine, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or District.

Amend section 4 of said act by striking out the words "pleuro-pneumonia, or," in the third line.

Amend section 5 of said act by striking out the words "and especially pleuro-pneumonia," in the third and fourth lines.

Amend section 6 of said act by striking out the words "and especially the disease known as," in the sixth line, and the word "pleuro-pneumonia," in the seventh line, and by striking out all of the section after the words "communicable disease," in the fifteenth line.

Repeal section 8 of said act, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That whenever any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease affecting domestic animals shall be brought into or shall break out in the District of Columbia, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to take prompt measures to suppress the same and prevent the disease from spreading; and for this purpose the said Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby empowered to order and require that any premises, farm, or farms were such disease exists or has existed be put in quarantine; to order any or all animals coming into the District of Columbia to be detained at any place or places he may designate for the purpose of inspection and examination; to prescribe rules and regulations for disinfection, and to make such other regulations as he may deem necessary to prevent infection or contagion being communicated; the expense of the care of the animals detained or quarantined by order of the Commissioner of Agriculture to be paid by the owner of the animal or animals."

That section 9 of said act is so amended as to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. That any officer appointed under this act, or the act to which this is amendatory, may enter, in the daytime, for the purposes of examination and inspection, under the provisions hereof, any building, inclosure, or place, in any State or Territory whose executive authorities co-operate in this law, or in the District of Columbia, where animals are kept by the owner, consignee, or custodian thereof; and any person refusing permission to an officer of the Department of Agriculture appointed as aforesaid to make necessary examination of animals supposed to be diseased, or attempting to prevent such officer from entering upon premises where such disease is supposed to exist, shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $500, or by imprisonment for not less than thirty nor more than one hundred days, or by both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court; and any person who shall knowingly conceal the existence of such disease or diseases on his premises, and who shall fail to report their presence to the proper authorities, shall, upon conviction, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by the same penalties as are provided for resisting the officers of the Department of Agriculture before mentioned; and any owner, custodian, or consignee of any animal who fails, within twenty-four hours after the death of any animal under his care or in his possession, from disease, to report the death to the properly appointed authorities, with an account of the symptoms of the disease before death, as far as possible, with a notice of where the carcass may be seen and inspected, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and punished by the same penalties as provided for other offenses under this act. That it shall be the duty of the several United States district attorneys to prosecute all violations of this act which shall be brought to their notice or knowledge by any person making the complaint under oath; and the same shall be heard before any district or circuit court of the United States or Territorial court holden within the district in which the violation of this act has been committed."

That section 10 of the said act is so amended as to read as follows:

"That the sum of $150,000, to be immediately available, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act: Provided, That an amount of the money thus appropriated, not to exceed $10,000, be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture in reimbursing owners of cattle for animals slaughtered for the purposes of post mortem and to advance scientific investigations as to the cause and treatment of disease among cattle: Provided further, That no portion of this amount be expended in any State or Territory whose executive authorities refuse to co-operate with the Commissioner of Agriculture in the establishing of a quarantine when recommended by the Commissioner of Agriculture or the chief of the bureau of animal industry."

Add the following section:

"SEC. —. That the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to appoint a corps of veterinary surgeons, at a salary of not more than $10 and not less than $5 per diem, when actually engaged by order of the chief of the bureau of animal industry, whose duty it shall be to visit the stock-yards, shambles, and slaughtering-houses, and inspect and report the condition of the cattle slaughtered for food. It shall be their duty to co-operate with the proper health officers of the State, Territory, county, or city in which they may be engaged, and to report to such health officers all cases coming under their notice where diseased meat or impure milk is sold as food."

Mr. SWINBURNE. I also ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a communication addressed to the Committee on Agriculture by the Commissioner of Agriculture, in response to a resolution directing him to submit a statement of the names of the owners of infected cattle or herds, the localities where the disease has existed, the means which have been taken to suppress it, &c.

There being no objection, leave was granted. The communication is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 23, 1885.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a communication from your committee, dated the 15th instant, requesting information in regard to pleuro-pneumonia among cattle as asked for in an inclosed resolution that was introduced into the House by Mr. SWINBURNE; also requesting such other specific information concerning the existence and spread of the disease as I may have at hand. The resolution of Mr. SWINBURNE reads as follows:

"Whereas in the last report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, submitted to this Congress, of the bureau of animal industry, it is stated that at the time of submitting the report 445 herds of cattle, aggregating 60,000 animals, were exposed to a disease called pleuro-pneumonia, and that 1,700 animals were then sick; and

"Whereas it has been learned since the making of the report that the disease does not exist in localities where it was reported to exist: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the Commissioner of Agriculture be directed to submit to Congress within ten days a detailed statement of the names of the owners of such herds and infected cattle, and the town, county, and State in which such cattle are located, and also what proportion of the 1,700 reported infected cattle have died and what proportion have recovered. He is further directed to state what means, if any, have been taken to suppress the disease or prevent the spread of the contagion by quarantine or otherwise, and, if by quarantine, a specific statement of the method pursued; and also what number of the 60,000 animals exposed became infected with the disease and how many of these have died and how many recovered."

Before attempting to comply with this request I would respectfully direct the attention of your honorable committee to an error in the preamble of Mr. SWINBURNE'S resolution, which necessitates a somewhat different answer from what was evidently anticipated. I have not stated that "four hundred and forty-five herds of cattle, aggregating sixty thousand animals, were exposed to a disease called pleuro-pneumonia." By reference to the statement of the chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry (page 3, report 1234, House of Representatives, Forty-ninth Congress, first session) it will be seen that during the two years of 1884 and 1885, there were discovered four hundred and forty-five infected herds, containing seventeen hundred and thirty-seven affected animals; but the figures were not given for the aggregate number of animals exposed to the contagion in these herds.

The resolution seems to be based upon the assumption that no information has been furnished to Congress in regard to the "names of the owners of such herds and infected cattle, and the town, county, and State in which such herds are located." For this information I beg to refer your committee to the first and second annual reports of the bureau of animal industry, copies of which accompany this communication. In the first report there is a complete record of inspections for the year, beginning on page 71 and ending on page 167. In the second report there is a similar record, beginning on page 553 and ending on page 654. The address of the owners is given as accurately as possible in every case, as well as the date of inspection, the name of the inspector, the total number of animals in the herd, and the number, if any, sick at the time of inspection.

In reference to that part of the preamble which states that "it has been learned since the making of the report that the disease does not exist in localities where it was reported to exist," I would respectfully say that my information is not in accord with this statement. If by localities individual premises are meant, then the statement may be admitted to be correct; for with pleuro-pneumonia, as with all other contagious diseases, some herds are continually being rescued from the contagion, while others are as continually coming under its influence. If, however, we use the word localities in the sense of States or counties, I see no reason to believe that, with the exception of Kentucky and Illinois, there has been any material change. The sentence in question might convey the impression that the disease had been reported to exist in localities where it did not exist at the time the inspection was made. As to this it may be said that every precaution was taken to obtain accurate reports.

The inspectors selected were veterinarians of experience and reputation; most of them were connected with local boards of health, and for this reason had unusual facilities for ascertaining the facts, and all were sworn to a faithful performance of their duties. The original reports are on file in this Department, and in many cases were confirmed by other inspectors. I have every reason to believe, therefore, that the reports of the Bureau of Animal Industry are as correct as it is possible to make them, and that the disease will still be found to exist in substantially the same localities and to as great an extent as there reported, though some herds then affected are doubtless free from it now, while others free at that time are as certainly infected to-day.

As to the proportion of the 1,737 affected animals which recovered and the proportion which died, and as to the proportion of those exposed which afterward became affected, I have no information. The inspection was made to obtain facts as to the extent of the disease, and it was impossible under the existing law to keep infected herds under supervision, or to obtain any facts as to the subsequent history of the herds, with the exception of cases referred to further along in this communication. The publication of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia in herds, without the adoption of prompt measures for suppressing it, causes so much damage to the owners that, in many cases, they not only refused to give information, but they will prevent the examination of the animals at subsequent visits.

The only way to learn the fate of the animals in such herds is to place a watch on the premises and maintain it day and night. For four hundred and fifty infected herds this would require at least nine hundred men, a force which it was clearly impossible for the Department to employ, even if the expenditure should be considered a judicious and necessary one. In fact, we would not have been able to obtain accurate data even in this way, because many affected animals, probably the greater part of them, are slaughtered or sold before the natural termination of the disease.

As to the quarantine of infected herds, a glance at the law is sufficient to show that this Department can not enforce quarantine regulations within any State unless under State laws and by co-operation with State authorities. The only penalties in the national law are for driving or transporting affected cattle from one State or Territory into another, and if the penalty clause is construed strictly, as I believe is the rule in such cases, there is nothing to prevent the removal of that part of an infected herd which has not yet shown symptoms of the disease from any State into any other State.

In certain cases the Department has been able to co-operate with State authorities, and to maintain quarantine regulations by means of State laws; but it has been in all cases a most difficult matter to divide the responsibilities and duties between Federal and State officials. There have been unavoidable discord and jealousy between the subordinate officers of the States and the inspectors of the Bureau of Animal Industry which has more or less impaired the value of the work. It seems next to impossible for officers obtaining their authority from two distinct sources to work harmoniously in a service of this character; and I would recommend most emphatically either that sufficient authority be given to this Department to eradicate the plague or that the work be left entirely to State authorities.

To efficiently quarantine infected herds for any considerable period is a most difficult thing to accomplish, even with the most rigid laws and the severest penalties. If a dairy herd is quarantined the publication of the notice at once ruins the sale of milk from that herd; it also prevents the sale of animals for beef in many cases, because the public prefer to draw their beef and milk supplies from uncontaminated animals. Now, just as soon as an individual finds his income is cut off, and that he is under the necessity of feeding a large number of animals at ruinous expense, with no prospect of relief, he attempts to remove the animals surreptitiously, and unless rigid regulations can be enforced he will succeed. Animals can be removed and others having the same general appearance can be substituted for them almost without the possibility of detection, and this is frequently done.

But even where this can be prevented it is simply impossible to prevent the spread of contagion by men and animals going from an infected herd to others where the disease has not appeared. No quarantine can, therefore, be perfect without placing a sufficient guard over every infected premises to prevent men or animals liable to carry the contagion from mingling with the outside world. Such a quarantine is so expensive and so intolerable to the citizens of this country that I do not believe it could be maintained; and, for these reasons, I have recommended, and do now recommend, that wherever an infected herd is discovered, all exposed animals be slaughtered, the premises thoroughly disinfected, and the owner compensated for the loss to which he is subjected for the protection of the public.

To efficiently keep up a single quarantine is a difficult matter, but when we attempt to maintain 500 or perhaps 1,000 at a time, it is a task that can only be accomplished with an immense force and at enormous expense. As an illustration of the difficulty of maintaining an efficient quarantine, even at one point, I would respectfully direct your attention to the outbreak of cholera at the port of New York and vicinity which occurred in 1866. At that time Mr. SWINBURNE was, as I understand, health officer of the port, and undoubtedly he enforced such regulations as appeared to him necessary to prevent the transfer of the contagion from the vessels to the shore. Any one can appreciate the advantages to be derived from the surroundings in such a quarantine. With the contagion on board a ship and surrounded by salt water, the conditions would appear to be most favorable for preventing its extension. And yet we read in the report of the Metropolitan Board of Health for that year, that "on the 18th of April the steamer Virginia, from Liverpool, arrived at quarantine with the cholera on board. The first case in the city of New York was on the 1st day of May in a small tenement-house on Third avenue, near Ninety-third street" (p. 55). That is, with these favorable conditions of quarantine the cholera appeared in the city of New York within about twelve days after the arrival of the first infected vessel at quarantine. This would indicate that the quarantine had very little effect in arresting the progress of the contagion. The quarantines on land equally failed to confine the contagion to the original centers of infection. The report goes on to say that the cholera continued to prevail during June, July, August, September, and October (p. 56). "We have ample proof that of the number of persons who died in New York, between the first of May and the last of November, 1,212 died of Asiatic cholera" (p. 187). The number of deaths from the same cause was placed at 573 in Brooklyn and Kings County (p. 306); at 482 on Blackwell's Island (p. 295); at 172 on Ward's Island (p. 253); and at 27 on Randall's Island (p. 253). This makes a total of 2,344 cases of cholera which occurred in that vicinity during the summer of 1866, in spite of a quarantine maintained by so able a health officer as Mr. SWINBURNE.

Quarantines against animal contagion, and particularly against the virulent principle of the pleuro-pneumonia of cattle, have also been powerless to prevent the extension of this plague except in certain isolated places. In this connection I would refer to the outbreak of this disease in Kentucky, which began in 1884 and was not entirely stamped out until March, 1886. A portion of the history of this outbreak is recorded in the reports of the Bureau of Animal Industry for 1884 and 1885. When first discovered the plague was confined to one herd. There was an attempt to maintain quarantine by the force of public opinion in the absence of any specific statutes, but, as was to be expected, it was not successful.

The danger of the extension of the contagion was such that on June 15, 1885, the infected premises were declared in quarantine by authority of the State board of health. At that time an additional herd was found infected and included in the regulations, a copy of which will be found on page 35 of the Report of the Bureau of Animal Industry for 1885. By request of the board, an inspector of the Bureau was stationed at Cynthiana to watch the results of this quarantine. November 16, 1885, he reported that the disease had been found at six places in Cynthiana, at three places in the Indian Creek neighborhood, 3½ miles east of Cynthiana, and at one place near the Pendleton County line, 13 miles north of Cynthiana.

Early in March, 1886, the Legislature of Kentucky enacted a law authorizing the State board of health to slaughter the infected cattle, and appropriated money to compensate the owners. The slaughter began on March 15, and on March 27 I received official notification that all exposed animals had been slaughtered. I give below a copy of a letter from the secretary of the board to the chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, which shows his estimate of the value of the services rendered by this Department in suppressing the malady:

BOWLING GREEN, KY., March 27, 1886.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inform you, as Dr. Wray has doubtless done in detail, that in the execution of the recently enacted law in relation to contagious and infectious diseases in cattle, this board has exterminated contagious pleuro-pneumonia in this State by the slaughter of all animals which have been exposed to that disease, and rigidly quarantining all infected premises.

In consequence of the foregoing facts, we hope to have the influence of your department in securing the removal of the restrictions now imposed against Kentucky cattle by most of the Western States.

I desire also to call your attention to the inclosed resolution in regard to Dr. Wray, and to add that there is every reason to believe that but for the timely and efficient aid rendered me by your Department during the last year, the disease would have made such headway, and the sum of money required for its extirpation would have been so large, that our Legislature could not have been induced to extirpate the disease. I inclose a copy of our law and quarantine blanks.

Respectfully yours,

J. M. McCORMICK, Secretary.

Dr. D. E. SALMON,
Chief of Bureau of Animal Industry, Washington, D. C.

Resolved, That the thanks of the State board of health of Kentucky be and are hereby tendered to Dr. W. H. Wray for the faithful, efficient and intelligent manner in which he has discharged his important duties in the management of the outbreak of contagious pleuro-pneumonia in Harrison County.

A true extract from the proceedings of the board.

J. M. McCORMICK,
Secretary.

Dr. Wray furnished the following statement showing the number of infected herds and animals in the vicinity of Cynthiana, and the results of the disease at each place:

Previous to August 4, 1885, four animals in the Frisbie & Lake herd had died, and 14 sick ones had been slaughtered. From and after August 4 the extent of the disease and the disposition of the animals are seen in the following table:

*Killed by mob.

Dr. Wray remained at Cynthiana until June 22, or about three months after the last infected animal was slaughtered, and no case of this disease was discovered during that time. I have recently had reliable reports from that vicinity, and I am satisfied that no case of pleuro-pneumonia has occurred since the slaughter of the infected cattle in March.

This outbreak in Kentucky of itself indicates the great superiority of a method which secures the prompt extirpation of the contagion over any temporizing measures designed to preserve instead of to destroy it. As soon as pleuro-pneumonia was known to exist in Kentucky the other States of the Union quarantined against Kentucky cattle, and the enormous commerce in these animals was prostrated.

The local quarantine measures were looked upon by the authorities of other States as an insufficient guarantee of the safety of cattle from Kentucky, and, therefore, no bovine animals were allowed admitted from there except under rigid and and burdensome restrictions. These restrictions, maintained for nearly two years, are estimated to have caused a loss to the cattle-breeders of the State of from ten to twelve millions of dollars, a loss which would have been entirely prevented if there had been authority for this Department to have caused the prompt destruction of the infected herds when the plague was first discovered.

A quarantine of the infected herd does not prevent such losses, because the existence of this fatal contagion in any State, no matter how thoroughly it is isolated, destroys the confidence of the trade, unsettles values, and leads to restrictions on interstate commerce, which results in enormous injury to the country. There is no confidence felt by the community at large in the efficacy of a quarantine to hold in check the contagion of this plague, and the history of the outbreak given above shows how much reason there is for this lack of confidence. Even admitting for the sake of argument that quarantine measures alone are sufficient to stop the spread of the malady, which they are not, it is plain that such measures are in no sense a solution of our present difficulty.

The losses from restrictions on trade are far greater than those caused by the disease itself, and measures are required which will prevent both the direct and indirect losses at the same time. Now the only measure which will accomplish this is the prompt extirpation of the plague whenever and wherever it appears. To quarantine a herd in any State without adopting such summary means of destroying the evil, is simply to set in motion the quarantine machinery of the neighboring States, which places such intolerable burdens upon cattle shipments as to practically ruin the traffic and cause losses greater than those we are attempting to prevent. This has been the experience of Missouri and Illinois as well as of Kentucky.

In September, 1886, pleuro-pneumonia was found by the State veterinarian to exist among cattle in the city of Chicago and vicinity. It was first discovered on the farm of John Crane, at Ridgeland, near Austin, a station on the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, 6 or 7 miles from Chicago. The diseased animal was killed September 12, and the post mortem examination showed conclusively that it was affected with lung plague. This cow had been on the premises a long time, but she had recently been exposed to an ailing cow that Mr. Crane had taken for trial with the intention of purchasing. The sick cow was brought on the place by Silas Palmer, a cow dealer, who had pastured her for some time previously on the Harvey farm, near Humboldt Park. It was represented to Mr. Crane that the cow was suffering from bad treatment and would soon recover. After doctoring it two or three weeks with no success the dealer was notified that it was not wanted, and he removed it.

In an attempt to trace the contagion the Harvey farm was visited by the State veterinarian September 15 and 16, and he found there 250 head of cattle, among which were 8 affected with pleuro-pneumonia. These animals were at once quarantined. An investigation of the history of the disease at this farm led to the conclusion that it had been introduced by a herd of 38 cows brought there to pasture by a milkman named Quinn, who had recently removed his animals from the Phœnix distillery stables. This led to an examination of the cattle in the distillery stables and to the discovery that many of them were infected with pleuro-pneumonia.

The Phœnix stables were quarantined September 19. They contained 1,185 animals, of which 297 were Western steers and bulls which had been placed there to fatten September 15, by Nelson Morris. The remainder of the animals were milch cows, belonging to a number of different owners. The stables of the Chicago and Empire distilleries were quarantined the same day. They contained respectively 496 and 207 animals. The Shufeldt stables, containing 985 animals, were quarantined September 20.

A further examination of the cattle of Mr. Crane, September 18, showed that another one was sick, and this, together with two exposed ones, was slaughtered. The day before (September 17) two sucking calves were found affected at the Harvey farm, and were slaughtered.

September 20, two sick cows were killed at the Phœnix and found affected with pleuro-pneumonia. September 22 the chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, in company with the State veterinarian and members of the State live-stock commission, made an investigation at the Phœnix and Shufeldt stables to satisfy himself as to the nature of the disease. The examination was made on one animal that had died and two that were killed at the former stable, and upon one that was killed and one found dead at the latter. All were undoubtedly affected with contagious pleuro-pneumonia.

The milkmen at first denied the existence of any disease among their cattle, but when the evidence became too strong to be longer contested, it was admitted that they had recognized the presence of a lung disease in 1884. They at first attributed it to chemicals used in the mash by the distillery, also to feeding the slop too hot, but they finally concluded it was contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and were practicing inoculation to lessen the mortality.

The progress of the plague after quarantine may be seen from the following notes made from day to day by the veterinarians. A part of these were kindly furnished by Doctor Casewell, State veterinarian, and the remainder were collected by Doctor Trumbower, inspector of the Bureau of Animal Industry. It is to be borne in mind that the mortality was probably lessened by the practice of inoculation.

October 6. One dead at the Phœnix; one dead at the Chicago.

October 8. One slaughtered at the Chicago.

October 10. One dead at the Phœnix; one slaughtered and one dead at the Chicago.

October 11. One dead at the Phœnix.

October 12. One dead at the Shufeldt.

October 13. Two dead at the Chicago; one dead at the Shufeldt.

October 16. One cow and one steer dead at the Phœnix. (This was the first steer that died of pleuro-pneumonia out of the lot placed in these stables September 15.) One dead at the Shufeldt. Ten cows from the Shufeldt were taken to abattoir and slaughtered; lungs found healthy.

October 17. One slaughtered and one dead at the Chicago; one cow and two bulls from the Phœnix slaughtered; lungs healthy.

October 18. One cow slaughtered at the Shufeldt affected; four slaughtered from the Phœnix, lungs healthy; seven slaughtered from the Chicago, lungs healthy.

October 19. Two cows and one steer dead at the Phœnix; one dead at the Chicago; killed fourteen cows from the Phœnix, lungs healthy.

October 20. One cow and two steers dead at the Phœnix, only one of the latter affected with lung plague. Two healthy cows from the Phœnix slaughtered; one dead at the Chicago.

October 21. Two dead at the Shufeldt; one dead at the Chicago; three dead at the Phœnix; slaughtered two healthy cows from the Phœnix.

October 22. Two steers dead at the Phœnix; one dead at the Shufeldt; slaughtered five affected animals at the Shufeldt.

October 23. One dead at the Chicago; one dead at the Shufeldt.

October 24. At the Chicago two dead and one slaughtered, which was affected.

October 25. Slaughtered eleven at the Chicago, all healthy; one cow and two steers dead at the Phœnix; slaughtered sixteen cows from the Phœnix, all healthy.

October 26. One steer and one cow dead at the Phœnix; slaughtered twenty-four cows from the Phœnix, three affected; one dead at the Shufeldt.

October 27. Slaughtered fourteen cows and two calves from the Phœnix; lungs healthy; one cow and one bull dead at the Phœnix.

October 28. Killed two cows at the Shufeldt, one affected with pleuro-pneumonia and one with chronic indigestion.

October 29. One dead at the Shufeldt.

October 30. One killed affected and one died from choking at the Sheufeldt; one affected steer killed and three steers dead at the Phœnix.

October 31. One dead at the Shufeldt; one dead at the Phœnix.

November 1. Slaughtered three at the Shufeldt; lungs healthy; one dead at the same place; slaughtered fourteen cows from the Phœnix, five of which were affected; (nine healthy lungs).

November 2. One dead at the Phœnix.

November 3. Slaughtered eighteen cows from the Phœnix, five affected; one steer and two cows dead at the Phœnix (thirteen lungs healthy).

November 4. One cow dead at the Shufeldt; killed one cow, lungs healthy; killed five at the Chicago; lungs healthy; one steer dead at the Phœnix.

November 5. Two cows and one steer dead at the Phœnix; one cow dead at the Shufeldt.

November 6. One steer dead at the Phœnix.

November 7. One steer dead at the Phœnix; one cow dead at the Shufeldt.

November 8. One slaughtered at the Shufeldt, affected; one steer dead at the Phœnix.

November 9. Slaughtered fourteen from the Shufeldt; nine affected.

November 10. One steer and one bull dead at the Phœnix; slaughtered nineteen from the Shufeldt; two affected.

November 11. Two steers dead at the Phœnix; one cow slaughtered, lungs healthy.

November 12. One cow dead at the Phœnix.

November 13. One cow dead at the Shufeldt; visited Harvey farm and found two new cases.

November 14. Two steers dead at the Phœnix; one cow dead at the Shufeldt; examined forty-five cows; two affected.

November 15. Slaughtered two cows from the Phœnix; both affected; also eleven from the Shufeldt; four affected.

November 16. Two cows dead at the Shufeldt; two cows dead at the Phœnix.

November 17. One steer dead at the Phœnix; one cow killed at the Chicago; affected.

November 18. One cow condemned at the Phœnix.

November 19. Killed six cows from the Phœnix; two affected; one steer dead at same place.

November 21. One cow dead at the Shufeldt.

November 22. One steer dead at the Phœnix; one cow dead at the Shufeldt.

November 24. One cow slaughtered from the Shufeldt; lungs healthy.

November 25. Slaughtered one diseased cow at Ridgeland.

November 26. Three cows dead at the Shufeldt, one of which died from choking.

November 27. One cow dead at the Shufeldt; one cow dead at the Chicago; slaughtered twelve cows from the Phœnix, one of which was affected.

November 30. One cow and one steer dead at the Phœnix; slaughtered five affected steers and bulls at same place.

November 28. Slaughtering was begun on a larger scale in order to empty the distillery stables as soon as possible. The figures given below, which show the proportion of the slaughtered animals that were more or less affected with pleuro-pneumonia, are of great interest, because they demonstrate the advisability of slaughtering all animals once exposed to this contagion. Many of the affected cattle presented no symptoms of disease before slaughter, but the condition of their lungs was such as to make it very certain that they were capable of disseminating the contagion for an indefinite period. The record is as follows:

Date.	Number slaughtered.	Number affected.

Of the 297 steers and bulls which were put in the Phœnix stables September 15, by Mr. Morris, 37 affected with pleuro-pneumonia died or were killed for examination previous to the 28th of November. Three others died of Texas fever and one cripple was killed up to the same date. November 29 and 30 and December 1, 244 of the remainder were slaughtered, of which 182 were found affected.

One of the inspectors of the bureau of animal industry was stationed at the rendering company's platform from October 19 to November 30, to make post mortem examinations of all cows coming there from the city of Chicago. During that time he examined 19 cows, of which 6 had died of lung plague.

The following table shows the number of cattle placed in quarantine in Chicago and vicinity from October 13 to November 30, all being in private herds in stables, and the greater part of which were quarantined because of exposure to affected cattle on the various commons about the city:

*Stables. †Quarantined for exposure.

The above is a brief résumé of the work that has been accomplished in Chicago by co-operation between the State live stock commission and the Bureau of Animal Industry since the discovery of the recent outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia. As there was great apprehension that cattle would be removed from the distillery stables and disseminate the disease in Illinois and other States, I placed a guard of deputy sheriffs at each stable and at the Harvey farm. Two were on duty at each place during the day and four at night. Besides these, two men were employed to count the cattle daily in order that any decrease in number would be at once discovered. Six veterinary inspectors were also ordered to Chicago, to inspect the city and learn to what extent the contagion had progressed outside of the distillery stables. With this force I have co-operated as effectively as possible with the State authority under the following rules and regulations:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Rules and regulations for co-operation between the United States Department of Agriculture and the authorities of the several States and Territories for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia of cattle.

Recent acts of Congress make it the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare rules and regulations for the suppression and extirpation of the contagious pleuro-pneumonia of cattle, and authorize expenditures for investigation, disinfection, quarantine, and for the purchase of diseased animals for slaughter. The following are the sections bearing upon this subject:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act. Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist, or such State or Territory shall have adopted plans and methods for the suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and such plans and methods shall be accepted by the Commissioner of Agriculture, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, and in such disinfection and quarantine measures as may be necessary to prevent the spread of the disease from one State or Territory into another. (Approved May 29, 1884.)

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

For carrying out the provisions of the act of May 29, 1884, establishing the Bureau of Animal Industry, $100,000; and the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to use any part of this sum he may deem necessary or expedient, and in such manner as he may think best, to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, and for this purpose to employ as many persons as he may deem necessary, and to expend any part of this sum in the purchase and destruction of diseased animals whenever, in his judgment, it is essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia from one State into another. (Approved June 30, 1886.)

In accordance with these laws I hereby certify the following rules and regulations for co-operation between the Department of Agriculture and the authorities of the several States and Territories, which I deem necessary to ensure results commensurate with the money expended:

INSPECTION.

1. The necessary inspectors will be furnished by the bureau of animal industry of the Department of Agriculture.

2. The properly constituted inspectors of the bureau of animal industry which are assigned to the respective States are to be authorized by proper State authorities to make inspections of cattle under the laws of the State; they are to receive such protection and assistance as would be given to State officers engaged in similar work, and shall be permitted to examine quarantined herds whenever so directed by the Commissioner of Agriculture or the chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

3. All reports of inspections will be made to the Bureau of Animal Industry, and a copy of these will then be made and forwarded to the proper State authorities; when, however, any inspector discovers a herd infected with contagious pleuro-pneumonia, he will at once report the same to the proper State authority, as well as to the Bureau of Animal Industry.

4. The inspectors, while always subject to orders from the Department of Agriculture, will cordially co-operate with State authorities and will follow instructions received from them.

QUARANTINE.

5. When contagious pleuro-pneumonia is discovered in any herd, the owner or person in charge is to be at once notified by the inspector, and the quarantine regulations of the State in which the herd is located are to be enforced from that time. The affected animals will be isolated, when possible, from the remainder of the herd until they can be properly appraised and slaughtered.

* * * * * * *

8. Quarantine restrictions once imposed are not to be removed by the State authorities without due notice to the proper officers of the Department of Agriculture.

9. The period of quarantine will be at least ninety days, dating from the removal of the last diseased animal from the herd. During this period no animal will be allowed to enter the herd or to leave it, and all animals in the herd will be carefully isolated from other cattle.

When possible, all infected herds are to be held in quarantine and not allowed to leave the infected premises except for slaughter. In this case fresh animals may be added to the herd at the owner's risk, but are to be considered as infected animals and subjected to the same quarantine regulations as the other members of the herd.

SLAUGHTER AND COMPENSATION.

10. All animals affected with contagious pleuro-pneumonia are to be slaughtered as soon after their discovery as the necessary arrangements can be made.

11. When diseased animals are reported to the State authorities, they shall promptly take such steps as they desire to confirm the diagnosis. The animals found diseased are then to be appraised according to the provisions of the State law, and the proper officer of the Bureau of Animal Industry (who will be designated by the Commissioner of Agriculture) notified of the appraisement. If this representative of the Bureau of Animal Industry confirms the diagnosis and approves the appraisement, the Department of Agriculture will purchase the diseased animals of the owner and pay such a proportion of the appraised value as is provided for compensation in such cases by the laws of the State in which the animals are located, when they are condemned and slaughtered by State authority.

DISINFECTION.

12. All necessary disinfection will be conducted by the employés of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

INOCULATION.

13. Inoculation is not recommended by the Department of Agriculture, and it is believed that its adoption with animals that are to be afterward sold to go into other herds would counteract the good results which would otherwise follow from the slaughter of the diseased animals. It may, however, be practiced by State authorities under the following rules: It will not be practiced in this State.

* * * * * * *

The co-operation of governors, of State live-stock commissions, and of other officers who may be in charge of the branch of the service provided for the control of the contagious diseases of animals in the States where pleuro-pneumonia exists, is earnestly requested under these rules and regulations, which have been framed with a view of securing uniform and efficient action throughout the whole infected district. It is hoped that with a vigorous enforcement of such regulations, the disease may be prevented from extending beyond its present limits, and may be in time entirely eradicated.

NORMAN J. COLMAN,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 2, 1886.

By virtue of the authority imposed upon me as governor of the State of Illinois, I hereby accept the above rules and regulations, and the proper officers of this State will co-operate with the United States Department of Agriculture for their enforcement.

RICHARD J. OGLESBY.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., September 27, 1886.

Rules 6, 7, 14, 15, 16, and 17 erased, the last clause of rule 13 erased and one sentence added, three words erased and three inserted in rule 8, before adoption by the governor. The rules and regulations as amended are accepted for the United States Department of Agriculture under authority conferred upon me by the Commissioner.

D. E. SALMON,
Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

The department has not purchased diseased animals for slaughter in Illinois, because the law of that State makes it the duty of the live-stock commissioners to slaughter such animals at once without compensation. With this law on the statute books of the State, and with no apparent reason why it should not be enforced, it was not, in my "judgment, essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia from one State into another" that any part of the appropriation should be used in Illinois to purchase diseased animals for slaughter. This conclusion was confirmed by the desirability of adopting only such measures as conform with the statutes of the States in which the work is being done, so long as our only authority to enforce regulations within the States must be obtained from State legislation.

Co-operation with the other infected States has not progressed as satisfactorily as was anticipated. In the latter part of July a conference was held in Philadelphia, at which were present the chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry and representatives of the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland. In formulating the rules and regulations for co-operation as much consideration was given to the views expressed at that conference as was consistent with the object that was to be accomplished. It was understood at the time that the four States there represented would co-operate with this department under any reasonable rules and regulations. August 2 the following rules and regulations were issued and sent to the governors of the interested States for their acceptance:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Rules and regulations for co-operation between the United States Department of Agriculture and the authorities of the several States and Territories for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia of cattle.

Recent acts of Congress make it the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare rules and regulations for the suppression and extirpation of the contagious pleuro-pneumonia of cattle, and authorize expenditures for investigation, disinfection, quarantine, and for the purchase of diseased animals for slaughter. The following are the sections bearing upon this subject:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act. Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist, or such State or Territory shall have adopted plans and methods for the suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and such plans and methods shall be accepted by the Commissioner of Agriculture, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, and in such disinfection and quarantine measures as may be necessary to prevent the spread of the disease from one State or Territory into another. (Approved May 29, 1884.)

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

For carrying out the provisions of the act of May 29, 1884, establishing the Bureau of Animal Industry, $100,000; and the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to use any part of this sum he may deem necessary or expedient, and in such manner as he may think best, to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, and for this purpose to employ as many persons as he may deem necessary, and to expend any part of this sum in the purchase and destruction of diseased animals whenever, in his judgment, it is essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia from one State into another. (Approved June 30, 1886.)

In accordance with these laws I hereby certify the following rules and regulations for co-operation between the Department of Agriculture and the authorities of the several States and Territories, which I deem necessary to insure results commensurate with the money expended.

INSPECTION.

1. The necessary inspectors will be furnished by the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture.

2. The properly constituted inspectors of the Bureau of Animal Industry which are assigned to the respective States are to be authorized by proper authorities to make inspections of cattle under the laws of the State; they are to receive such protection and assistance as would be given to State officers engaged in similar work, and shall be permitted to examine quarantined herds whenever so directed by the Commissioner of Agriculture or the chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

3. All reports of inspections will be made to the Bureau of Animal Industry, and a copy of these will then be made and forwarded to the proper State authorities; when, however, any inspector discovers a herd infected with contagious pleuro-pneumonia, he will at once report the same to the proper authority as well as to the Bureau of Animal Industry.

4. The inspectors, while always subject to orders from the Department of Agriculture, will cordially co-operate with State authorities and will follow instructions received from them.

QUARANTINE.

5. When contagious pleuro-pneumonia is discovered in any herd, the owner or person in charge is to be at once notified by the inspector and the quarantine regulations of the State in which the herd is located are to be enforced from that time. The affected animals will be isolated, when possible, from the remainder of the herd until they can be properly appraised and slaughtered.

6. To insure a perfect and satisfactory quarantine, a chain fastened with a numbered lock will be placed around the horns, or, with hornless animals, around the neck, and a record will be kept showing the number of the lock placed upon each animal in the herd.

7. The locks and chains will be furnished by the Department of Agriculture, but they will become the property of the State in which they are used, in order that any one tampering with them can be proceeded against legally for injuring or embezzling the property of the State.

8. Quarantine restrictions once imposed are not to be removed by the State authorities without the consent of the proper officers of the Department of Agriculture.

9. The period of quarantine will be at least ninety days, dating from the removal of the last diseased animal from the herd. During this period no animal will be allowed to enter the herd or to leave it, and all animals in the herd will be carefully isolated from other cattle.

When possible, all infected herds are to be held in quarantine and not allowed to leave the infected premises except for slaughter. In this case fresh animals may be added to the herd at the owner's risk, but are to be considered as infected animals and subjected to the same quarantine regulations as the other members of the herd.

SLAUGHTER AND COMPENSATION.

10. All animals affected with contagious pleuro-pneumonia are to be slaughtered as soon after their discovery as the necessary arrangements can be made.

11. When diseased animals are reported to the State authorities they shall promptly take such steps as they desire to confirm the diagnosis. The animals found diseased are then to be appraised according to the provisions of the State law, and the proper officer of the Bureau of Animal Industry (who will be designated by the Commissioner of Agriculture) notified of the appraisement. If this representative of the Bureau of Animal Industry confirms the diagnosis and approves the appraisement, the Department of Agriculture will purchase the diseased animals of the owner and pay such a proportion of the appraised value as is provided for compensation in such cases by the laws of the State in which the animals are located when they are condemned and slaughtered by State authority.

DISINFECTION.

12. All necessary disinfection will be conducted by the employés of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

INOCULATION.
